The issue of unemployment relief and the demand for governmental action took legislative form on the floor of the Senate for the first time in connection with the bill for loans for seed and other materials for crop production in the drought area, sponsored by the administration. It will be remembered that the Senate attempted to attach an additional $15,000,000 for loans for the purchase of food. This was rejected by the House; and the Senate receded, only to substitute an amendment to the Interior Department bill making available $25,000,000 to be expended by the Red Cross for relief of destitution in the cities and on the farms.

The administration brought its full influence to bear to defeat this amendment. The Red Cross was induced to assert that it would refuse to administer the fund if it were given. Leaders on the other side of the aisle who had originally sponsored the amendment were persuaded to reverse themselves.

At the time that compromise was under consideration, Mr. President, I had this to say:

I realize that there is no possibility of defeating this conference report. I realize that the votes have been gathered in to pass it; but I want to point out that the Senate of the United States and the Congress and the Executive are utterly failing to meet their responsibilities in this situation. The facts have been presented. The necessity of this assistance is manifest; and yet we are asked to accept this surrender of the position taken by the Senate by an overwhelming majority.

In 1930 the people of this country went to the polls. It is my conviction that one of the reasons for the overwhelming defeat of the administration and its policies in that contest was the fact that the President of the United States had failed to realize the magnitude of this economic disaster, and had indicated a determination not to afford any assistance to its innocent victims. The Democratic Party, being the party of opposition, was the party to which the people turned in the 1930 election. They gave that party a mandate to fight for the interests of the great mass of the workers and the farmers in this country. Even before the convening of Congress the leadership of the Democratic Party repudiated its mandate and declared for cooperation with the present administration.

Continuing to quote from my remarks made on February 10, 1931, I read:

I feel a good deal like one of the privates in the rear ranks of the army of the King of France, of whom it was said, according to the nursery rhyme that you remember:

"The King of France went up the hill,
With twenty thousand men;
The King of France came down the hill,
And ne'er went up again."

This is a humiliating surrender on the part of the Senate of a great principle, namely, the principle that the justification for government is that it will in emergencies protect its citizenship. We are permitting the precedent to be established that the millions of working men and women in this country and the farmers who are the victims of this drought shall be required to bear the burden, the economic depression, and the drought.

In view of the traditional history of this country to which I have adverted here this afternoon, I say that the Senate should not compromise upon that principle. It should adhere to the policy which the Government has always maintained of affording relief to citizens who are in distress and unable to meet their own problems.

Mr. President, this issue was one of the underlying issues in the campaign of 1930. It will be a dominant issue in the campaign of 1932. Parties and leaders failing to meet their responsibilities and to carry out this traditional policy of the American Government in extending relief to innocent victims of disaster, whether created by nature or by man, will be repudiated.

The Senate, however, did surrender its position. Under the leadership of leaders on both sides of the aisle, they humiliatingly surrendered to the dictates of the administration, and the relief which would have been afforded under the amendment was not available to meet human misery.

Efforts to obtain action upon a more adequate appropriation of $100,000,000 to supplement local relief activities were likewise blocked by leaders of the coalition. The only tangible consequence of the fight for relief was the undertaking by the Red Cross of a drive for a supplemental $10,000,000 indorsed by the President for relief purposes. In spite of administration support this drive succeeded only after two months of campaigning.

Efforts to induce the acceptance of an adequate public-works program were similarly unsuccessful. Instead the pittance of $116,000,000 to temporarily enlarge Federal construction was voted.

In the absence of administration leadership I demanded that—

Some attempt should be made on the part of Congress to afford the means for the mobilization of the intelligence of industry and finance in order that it may be brought to bear upon the problem of solving the question of distribution, as it has been brought to bear during the last 10 years upon the problem of increasing the productivity of our present organization.

I predicted that unless we did that "economic conditions may be infinitely worse 12 months from now than to-day."

This was a point of view with which the President of the United States and the leaders on both sides of this aisle had no sympathy. On February 3, 1931, during the controversy over the relief amendment to the Interior Department bill, the President had said:

The whole business situation would be greatly strengthened by the prompt completion of the necessary legislation at this session of Congress, and thereby the unemployment problem would be lessened.

He asserted that the American people were doing their job, and that they—

Should be given a chance to show whether they wish to preserve the principles of individual and local responsibility and mutual self-help before they embark on what I believe is a disastrous system. I feel sure they will succeed if given the opportunity.

Party leaders in Congress on both sides agreed with the President, and the session ended without relief legislation, without a public-works program, without measures looking to fundamental economic readjustment. For nine months the President was rid of Congress.

Unfortunately—and I point out, Mr. President, that there is likewise now a campaign going on for the adjournment of Congress—it became apparent that "the whole business situation" had not been strengthened, that unemployment had not been lessened, and that local relief activities could not meet the problem of dealing with the spread of distress.

In March, 1931, when Congress adjourned, industrial production had fallen to 87, a drop of 31 per cent since the peak of June, 1929, but a gain of 6 per cent during the time Congress was in session. Freight-car loadings had reached 80, a drop of 5 per cent during the session of Congress, a drop of 26 per cent since June, 1929. The value of building contracts was at 77, a gain of 5 per cent, but a loss of 39 per cent since June, 1929. Factory employment was at 77.9, factory pay rolls were at 74.9.

Mr. President, it has been claimed by some that we tried the theory of expanding public works during the session of the 1930–31 Congress. But it was evident then as it is now that the legislation enacted at that session had no effect during the year 1931, because there was a decline of $632,000,000 in the volume of public construction, from $3,632,000,000 in 1930, to $3,000,000,000 in 1931, attended at the same time by a 50 per cent decrease in private construction, so that the total volume of construction fell from $6,942,000,000 in 1930 to $4,800,000,000 in 1931.

The close of the session in March, 1931, was followed by the pocket veto of the employment exchange bill introduced by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

Early in April the President suddenly discovered that, after all, wage cuts were in progress. He was represented on April 1 as being "indignant" over the existence of a movement on the part of "the bankers" to drive down wage costs. On April 2, however, it was explained that he had been misinterpreted in the reports which had on the day before ascribed apprehension to him, and that, in fact, the leading industries had succeeded in keeping up existing wage scales. When on the following day the administration's attention was called to Bureau of Labor Statistics figures showing a considerable number of wage cuts, Secretary Doak insisted these applied only to minor establishments and that—

In general I believe manufacturers and business men are keeping the agreement made with the President during the conferences held here following the stock-market crash in 1929.

On April 6 Colonel Woods reported that the majority of the information received by his organization indicated continued need "for relief and made work by municipalities."

At the end of the month it was announced, on April 27, that Colonel Woods was leaving immediately for a vacation, and that seven members of the President's committee would retire from active connection with it. While E. A. Filene commented at the annual meeting of the chamber of commerce that "Colonel Woods is a man of action, who refuses to follow a road which leads windingly or not at all to the goal," it was explained on behalf of the administration that Woods had by no means left because of any misunderstanding with the President and that he had not actually severed connection with the committee.

Again, Mr. President, optimistic statements, forecasting early recovery, or suggesting great public-works activity to offset unemployment, came from the White House or from Cabinet officials and administration spokesmen at short intervals during the ensuing months.

A typical example was Secretary Doak's address in New York on May 4, 1931. Asserting that official data showed improvement in employment, the Secretary said:

No one can tell how long this depression will last, but I am confident that the bottom has been reached and an upward movement already has been started. * * * Courage, patience, and confidence in our ability will solve the economic and any other problem to confront us.

On behalf of the administration they continued to express doubt that wage cutting on anything approaching a substantial scale would occur, although several weeks before the President had intimated the existence of a wage-cutting drive, and William Green about the middle of May had taken the wage-cut problem sufficiently seriously to issue a warning that general wage reductions would produce widespread strikes. Secretary Doak on May 18 maintained that generally large industries had not diminished wages, and that he was "unprepared to say that there has been any concerted movement for wage cuts."

Mr. Fred C. Croxton, who had become acting chairman of the President's emergency employment committee, following Colonel Woods's resignation, stated on May 18:

Wages will be maintained. Labor and capital will work that out. I do not think the statement of President Green that wage reductions are imminent and will be followed by widespread labor disturbances is prophetic.

Following the submission to the President of the various memorials asking for a special session of Congress, and a statement by myself on May 21, citing a survey of current unemployment conditions and economic trends in support of a demand for an extra session, President Hoover on May 22 issued a formal announcement saying:

I do not propose to call an extra session of Congress. I know of nothing that would so disturb the healing processes now undoubtedly going on in the economic situation. We can not legislate ourselves out of a world economic depression; we can and will work ourselves out. A poll of the Members of Congress would show that a large majority agree with me in opposing an extra session.

I have no doubt that the latter part of that statement is true, because in view of the coalition which has existed during this depression between the Democrats and the Republicans, it is quite likely that a majority of both Houses of Congress, had they been polled, would have been found to be opposed to an extra session. Certainly every effort was made on both sides of the aisle by the leaders to hasten through all the legislation, so that a sine die adjournment on the 4th of March would not be followed by an extra session of Congress.

In the statement which I issued urging an extra session of Congress I said that—

The number of unemployed to be cared for in the next winter bids fair to remain close to the 6,000,000 found by the Census Bureau in its survey last January, and the unemployed, together with millions of others who had been working but a few days each week, will be facing dire conditions unless the Federal Government, through a vastly expanded public-works program or through aid to State and municipal governments, undertakes to ease the situation.

On May 22 I issued a statement in which I said that "under constructive leadership" an extra session could—

First. Provide immediate assistance to cities, counties, and States in relieving distress.

Second. Adopt a great public-works program "to provide a substantial amount of employment and to contribute toward the maintenance of wage standards."

Third. Enact agricultural relief legislation.

Fourth. Stimulate export trade by reducing tariffs.

Fifth. Increase income and estate taxes to meet the deficit, provide for a construction fund, and for relief of distress.

Sixth. Create a national economic council.

I said also that—

We have waited 20 months for some unforeseen miracle to bring the country out of disaster. The policy of drifting has failed. The time has come for action on all fronts to arrest the continual slide toward further depression and to bring about recovery on a sound basis.

A further White House announcement on May 26, 1931, said that—

Economic conditions were considered at length to-day by President Hoover and his Cabinet, and they found many factors they considered favorable.

At the same time the country was informed that installation of an air-cooling and heating system in the White House had been postponed as a result of the Government's campaign for economies. The nature of the "favorable factors" found by the Cabinet was not disclosed.

The cheery optimism which emanated from the White House contrasted sharply with a warning on June 8, by Acting Chairman Croxton, of the President's committee, that—

There must be no let-up in efforts of State, local, and private relief agencies to assist the needy. While demands during the summer will no doubt be lessened because of crop activities, it is almost certain that there will be several million unemployed to be taken care of at the advent of winter.

By this time, Mr. President, industrial production had fallen in June, 1931, some 35 per cent from the peak of 1929. It was at index 83. Freight-car loadings were at index 77, having fallen 4 per cent since the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March and 29 per cent since June, 1929. The value of building products stood at 63, a loss of 18 per cent since the adjournment of Congress on the 4th of March, a loss of 50 per cent since 1929. Factory employment was at 76, a loss of 26 per cent since June, 1929, and factory pay rolls were at 67.6, a loss of 38 per cent since June, 1929.

On June 15, 1931, the President of the United States delivered an address before the Indiana Republican Editorial Association. In the course of that address he attributed the prolongation of the depression to factors outside the United States; attacked the "minorities" who "would make political capital out of the depression through magnifying our unemployment and losses," and bear raiders; found that "the underlying forces of recovery are asserting themselves," and said that the very existence of fear resulted in "piling up savings in our savings banks until to-day they are the largest in our history," and predicted that "surplus money does not remain idle for long."

He also spoke of the Government's policy of "organizing cooperation in the constructive forces of the community and stimulating every element of initiative and self-reliance in the country," through the financial policies of the Federal reserve system, the Treasury, the Farm Loan Board, the Farm Board, and banks generally, through exhortations to maintain wages and salaries and to preserve the standard of living, and "organized cooperation with industry systematically to distribute the available work so as to give income to as many families as possible"; maintenance of construction work; drought relief; the agricultural marketing act; the tariff, thereby saving farmers and workers from low-wage foreign competition; governmental economy; restriction of immigration; maintenance of "systematic voluntary organization in the community in aid of employment and care for distressed," and in a score of other directions in which cooperation is organized and stimulation given. "We propose to go forward with these major activities and policies. We will not be diverted from them." Thereby "we will prevent any unnecessary distress in the United States, and by the activities and courage of the American people we will recover from the depression."

In that address he warned against—

Detouring capital away from industry and commerce * * * either by taxes or loans on the assumption that the Government can create more employment by use of these funds than can industry and commerce itself.

He continued:

While I am a strong advocate of expansion of useful public works in hard times, and we have trebled our Federal expenditures in aid to unemployment, yet there are limitations.

He said that industry and commerce must not be robbed "of its capital," that long engineering and legal interludes are involved; and "above all, schemes of public works which have no reproductive value would result in sheer waste."

There followed the 1-year moratorium of all payments on intergovernmental debts, reparations, and relief debts, which was announced on June 20, 1931, with the statement that it had already been approved by a long list of Members of Congress and by General Dawes and Owen D. Young, and that—

The purpose of this action is to give the forthcoming year to the economic recovery of the world and to help free the recuperative forces already in motion in the United States from retarding influences abroad.

The President stated that the weight of the intergovernmental debts, the fall in the prices of foreign commodities, lack of confidence in economic and political stability abroad, and the consequent gold movement into the United States—

And the other difficulties abroad diminished buying power for our exports and in a measure are the cause of our continued unemployment and continued lower prices to our farmers.

He continued by asserting that the reparation problem as such was one with which the United States has no relation and that he did not approve "in any remote sense of the cancellation of the debts to us."

Three days later, on June 23, it was said on behalf of the administration, by Commerce, Treasury, Agriculture, and Federal Reserve officials, that "economic gains of a more definite character are being registered with each week throughout the world." The statement continued:

Although officials of the Federal Government do not minimize the distress caused by the 2-year depression and their reports from business and finance show continuing low levels in many lines, their expressed opinions directed attention to healthier conditions disclosed in the reports, together with a widely spread attitude of looking into the future rather than of discussing the wounds left by the economic decline.

Domestic improvement was represented as greater than abroad; but throughout the world, it was declared, the results of preparation for a business revival have begun to show.

These conditions, having had their beginning, are expected now to move forward more rapidly under the impetus of the President's proposal for a year moratorium on international debts and reparations.

The President failed, however, to follow the moratorium with any constructive leadership looking to a solution of the debts, reparations, and armaments problem.

The optimism concerning the outlook for relief of the unemployed was badly shaken by the publication on July 21, 1931, of a report based upon a survey of 184 cities submitted to the President's Emergency Committee on Employment, and at its request, by Allen T. Burns. It said in part:

Reports from the 184 cities surveyed provide unquestionable confirmation of the prediction made to us in the beginning by Acting Chairman Croxton that, whatever change may come in business conditions, welfare and relief needs will be more acute next winter than last. * * * In many cities we find the number of dependent families doubled over last year's estimates. * * * It means that thousands of families, even where the breadwinner may have returned to work, have reached the end of their resources. It is evident that we must prepare now for a major task in social statesmanship.

The second conclusion to which the survey leads us is that private philanthropy can not possibly raise all the funds needed. * * * The larger percentage of the direct relief burden must be met through municipal and county appropriations. * * * In many places, notably Cleveland, Philadelphia, and New York, all funds raised for emergency relief from private sources have been exhausted.

On July 29, 1931, the President summoned Judge Payne, chairman of the Red Cross, to the White House. The White House was reticent concerning the conference, but Judge Payne said that he had been called to discuss "the best way to bring about cooperation among all unemployment agencies." He said that the President had begun a "thorough and comprehensive study" of the unemployment situation with a view toward bringing about such cooperation. He said:

"There is nothing extraordinary about unemployment conditions at this time. I think the situation is quite as well as last winter, excluding of course the drought. There is no drought now except in Montana and the Dakotas. It is a local problem. There is no possible reason why the Federal Government should be called upon. This country can deal with the unemployment situation without any difficulty if it is kept where it belongs—at home." Payne maintained that the Red Cross "has its own job to perform."

On the same day President William Green, of the American Federation of Labor, predicted that 7,000,000 industrial workers would be unemployed by winter and urged national action, including a shortening of working hours.

On the 31st of July it was announced that the President was "continuing his studies of the unemployment problem."

A Universal Service dispatch said that—

Mr. Doak provided the President with a wealth of statistical information to-day, including a general estimate of the number of unemployed, and the prospects of employment for the winter.

In contrast with the American Federation of Labor estimate of 7,000,000, "Secretary Doak's estimate, it is understood, is well below this figure."

On August 1, 1931, it was announced that the President had secured the services of Henry J. Allen, former Senator from Kansas, to go to England and Germany to make a study of the "dole," ostensibly for a group of newspapers, but actually as counter propaganda against probable efforts to force acceptance of some form of Federal unemployment relief.

On August 7, 1931, the President once more issued a long formal statement presenting his point of view on the unemployment problem.

For three weeks, he said, he had been studying, with members of the administration, the unemployment problem, and—

While improvement in the situation in many directions seems promising, the problem, whatever it may be, will be met. With the organized cooperation of local and State and Federal authorities, and the large number of relief and charitable organizations, the problem was successfully handled last winter. We shall adopt organization methods in such manner as may be necessary for the coming winter.

Studies of the probable volume of the load of distress were under way, he stated.

The second requirement, he said, was that of appraising existing organizations, and—the organization needed to cooperate with these agencies. I have been in communication with several governors and with other public authorities. Already many States and municipalities have begun to lay the foundation for action necessary to meet their problems.

He had also been conferring with business, financial, and labor leaders, and with leaders of relief and business organizations throughout the country. He said:

We have now under way a reexamination to determine the actual number to be employed through the steadily increasing volume of Federal public works. We are canvassing State and municipal and industrial construction to ascertain what may be expected in that direction.

The completion of these conferences and inquiries will require another month. By that time all the facts should be clear, both as to the load to be met, the progress and strength of organization in different regions and the character and method of national organization necessary to coordinate and support them.

The President added orally that he would not estimate the present or future number of unemployment, adding that estimates of unemployment, which run as high as 7,000,000 for next January, were not only bewildering but misleading. * * * He said that a figure given out last January purporting to show that 6,000,000 were out of work, had upon reexamination proven to have many defects. He added that there was no method of accurately determining the exact number out of work. The only solid basis for meeting the unemployment situation, the President said, is to find the number needing relief last winter, and the increase or decrease of that number in various localities as the result of unemployment trends since that time.

The New York Times special dispatch on the White House statement added:

While he did not say so, it is known that the President and his advisers are anxious to have a plan ready before December with which to forestall the possible enactment of "dole" legislation by the next Congress. He has been told by observers that unless a workable project is in progress by the time Congress meets, a flood of "socialistic" proposals is probable.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], after a conference with the President, said on August 10, according to the New York Times, "that every possible effort will be made" to avoid the "dole."

The Senator, who had luncheon with Mr. Hoover, said the President was seeking diligently to find a plan adequate to deal with the unemployment situation without committing the Government to the "dole" idea.

The Federal Government, Mr. FESS said—

Will not permit starvation in next winter's expected unemployment crisis. It was realized, he added, that private charity and local government funds to relieve distress, in some localities, will not be able to meet the total requirements without Federal aid.

The President's third great committee-appointing drive to deal with the depression was launched formally on August 19, 1931. The President announced that he had appointed Walter S. Gifford, president of American Telegraph & Telephone Co., president of the Charity Organization Society, and former director of the National Council of Defense—to set up and direct such organization as may be desirable, with headquarters at Washington, to cooperate with the public authorities and to mobilize the national, State, and local agencies of every kind which will have charge of the activities arising out of unemployment in various parts of the Nation this winter.

A survey to determine need during the next winter was under way. The work "directed so splendidly by Col. Arthur Woods during the past year" would be continued under Croxton's direction as part of the new organization. "I am appointing a nation-wide advisory committee to assist Mr. Gifford," the President said.

The task of proper assistance to the deserving is one which will again appeal to the generosity and humility of our whole people. It is a task which our Nation will perform, for in no people is there developed a higher sense of local responsibility and of responsibility of every man to his neighbor.

In his formal letter to Gifford, the President said that "irrespective of the improvement in employment" many localities would have a heavy relief load. "The whole force of the administration is at your disposal. Based upon my experience of some years in such problems, I am sure we shall compass this task."

The White House, on August 20, made public the names of 61 prospective appointees to the advisory committee to assist Gifford, and on August 21 the President announced that he had received "a splendid response"—52 acceptances. Messages from officials and organizations were coming in in large number and showed "a large amount of preparation for the coming winter." He spoke highly of the results obtained "by the multitude of committees and public authorities last winter. Whether they will have a heavier load to carry next winter is as yet unknown," he said, but he was confident they would meet the needs.

On the same day, August 21, the President made reference to a report of Surg. Gen. Hugh S. Cumming, of the United States Public Health Service. Citing public health "as an index of the ability of the public to weather the emergency," the President said that a report from Cumming on "the condition of public health the past winter" showed that "the general mortality and infant mortality and sickness was less than in either 1928 or 1929 when there was full employment. It is a most creditable showing which the country made last winter, and the various organizations deserve credit for it," the President said according to the United States Daily story.

The President furthermore claimed on August 21 that direct and indirect employment on Federal construction and maintenance work had grown from 180,000 at the beginning of the depression to 760,000 on August 1.

There followed, Mr. President, the organization of the new committee, the President's organization for unemployment relief, of which Mr. Gifford was the head, to deal with the problem of unemployment.

Senators are no doubt familiar with the testimony of Mr. Gifford taken by the Committee on Manufactures in connection with hearings on the Costigan-La Follette direct relief bill. It was developed there—and I shall not take the time of the Senate to go into the details of the organization—that the only purpose served by the committee was as a coordinating agency in an effort to aid the drives of local community chests in their campaigns to raise private contributions to meet the problem of unemployment relief.

However, Mr. President, as is well known, despite the heroic efforts on the part of that committee and of local organizations, the funds raised for unemployment relief during the past winter were woefully inadequate. The testimony presented during the discussion upon the relief bill last January showed conclusively that appalling conditions existed, not only in the metropolitan centers of the country but in the smaller communities, in the coal areas, and in many of the rural communities.

It was along in the fall that the administration for the first time suggested any legislative action on the part of the Federal Government to meet the crisis. It was then that the President initiated the organization of the National Credit Corporation to absorb the frozen assets of some of the banks.

He called a conference at the White House of leaders, both Democrats and Republicans, to secure their approval of a legislative program to be presented at the session of Congress which met in December last. When Congress met industrial production was at 74, a drop of 41 per cent since June, 1929; freight-car loadings were at 69, a loss of 36 per cent since 1929; the value of building contracts was as 38, a loss of 70 per cent since 1929; factory employment was at 69.4, a loss of 32 per cent; factory pay rolls were at 55.8, or a loss of 49 per cent, since June, 1929.

And what were the devices, Mr. President, upon which the leaders of both parties agreed? They were devices to tinker with the credit mechanism, seeking by expansion of credit to remedy this cataclysmic economic depression, utterly failing to recognize that the statistical indices were falling continuously all during this period not because of any lack of credit, but because of the diminishing purchasing power of the people on the farms and in the cities.

I described the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act as a measure to afford hospitalization to the casualties of this depression. While I am frank to admit that the loaning of credit by the Government of the United States in the last analysis to banks, railroads, and insurance companies may have postponed the receiverships of railroads, may have assisted insurance companies, and has effectively up until this time further stemmed the tide of bank failures, in and of itself all of the money loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation has hardly produced a single order for an additional ton of steel or an additional carload of bricks, nor has it produced orders for agricultural products or for consumer's goods.

Mr. President, unless we face the fact that the major cause of this depression is loss of purchasing power on the part of the farmers, the wage earners, and others in this country; unless we attempt adequately to recreate purchasing power, all efforts to check the further continuation of the depression will fail, as they have failed in the past.

The theory of expanding public works in times of depression to provide employment, to recreate purchasing power, and to stimulate a partial industrial recovery, has been advocated by economists for a great number of years. Any person who has made a study of this theory must recognize that the size of the program, and the timing of its employment, are the vital essentials to its success. If we expand public works, as we did to the extent of $116,000,000 in the session of 1930–31, we make no impression upon a depression of this magnitude and character. All we provide is a certain amount of employment for a small percentage of those who may be out of work; but the forces which are undermining the essential values upon which this entire structure rests go forward. It is only by launching a tremendous public-works program that we can hope to provide enough employment, to recreate a sufficient amount of purchasing power, and to exert a direct and indirect stimulus of sufficient potency upon industry, to check the downward trend, and to turn the spiral in the upward direction.

Mr. President, public construction in 1923 amounted to $2,100,000,000.

In 1924 it was $2,700,000,000.

In 1925, $2,800,000,000.

In 1926, $3,000,000,000.
In 1927, $3,700,000,000.
In 1928, $3,600,000,000.
In 1929, $3,500,000,000.
In 1930, $3,600,000,000.
In 1931, $3,000,000,000.

The best estimates which I have been able to obtain indicate that public construction in 1932 will amount to about one-half of what it was in 1931. Therefore, the program provided in the bill sponsored by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]—assuming that it all is gotten under way in 1932—will just about make up the decline in public construction this year over last year.

In so far as the projects contained in this bill provide employment, it will, of course, be of assistance to the men who are fortunate enough to be employed, either directly or indirectly; but to contend that the expenditure of the sum of money provided for in the pending measure would act as a stimulus toward economic recovery is to deny the facts which confront us.

It is perfectly obvious that if we are successfully to check the downward course of this depression we must adopt a program which will be sufficient, in its distribution of purchasing power and in its direct and indirect effect upon industry, to change materially the existing trend. Otherwise, we obviously face more serious disaster than has yet overtaken us.

I wish to call attention to the testimony of Prof. Willard L. Thorp, of Amherst College, in appearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor. He testified:

The Federal Government has accepted the responsibility for returning confidence to our financial structure. A vigorous public-works policy would further assist in recovery by injecting life into the producing mechanism. Once recovery has begun we can count upon the cumulative forces of increasing employment and advancing prices to carry us out of the depression.

Again, he said:

Assuming that such a program as I have outlined is desirable, the next problem is that of the best time to initiate it. It might be argued that we should wait until the next period of prosperity and then postpone building, catching up to the usual program when the next period of depression appears. There are at least three reasons why it would be better to initiate the program in a period of depression. The first reason is that many of the projects in public construction which enter into our usual expenditure of perhaps $3,000,000,000 per year can not be postponed. They represent items of necessity which must be done. From the point of view of public service it is much more feasible to advance construction rather than to delay it. The second reason for initiating such a program in time of depression is that it is then more acceptable both in the political mind and in the public mind. A policy of controlled public works was sponsored by many organizations and individuals at the time of the 1921 depression, but the ensuing period of prosperity did not prove to be a promising time for establishing it. The third reason lies in the present economic situation. I have not stressed in this statement the responsibility of Government agencies to give every possible assistance to the forces which are making for economic recovery. There can be no doubt but that a vigorous program of public works at this time would mean much more than immediate unemployment relief and the avoidance of the great social waste from idleness. Such a program would unquestionably inject into the present condition of stagnation the vitality necessary to begin real economic recovery.

I also wish to quote from the testimony before the same committee of Mr. John P. Hogan, a member of a large engineering firm of New York City. He said:

There has now arisen a crisis in municipal affairs, financial affairs, and State financial affairs which is resulting in continual abandonment of normal programs.

This thing is going on from day to day. Already 35 per cent, at least, of the remainder has been abandoned, and it looks now as if the total abandonment this year, at the present rate of acceleration, would be from 50 to 60 per cent of the remaining program.

Among other things he mentioned was the fact that New York City, the day before he testified, suspended $225,000,000 of public works.

He continued:

There are two reasons for that. One is either because they are forced to suspend through pressure from the banks or because the interest rate is so high at present that they can not go ahead with these projects and projects which would be self-supporting at any normal rate of interest cease to be self-supporting at 6 per cent, which is what the municipalities are generally being asked to pay now.

Further on he said:

Of the municipal and State work, which normally would be about two and one-half billions, and I think half of it, as 35 per cent has already gone by the boards.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. Then, that would have the effect of reducing employment to what extent, in your opinion?

Mr. HOGAN. At least 1,000,000 people for the construction season, counting not only those employed on the work but the industries involved.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. In other words, you think that in 1932, in the construction season, that there will be 1,000,000 less men employed than in 1931?

Mr. HOGAN. If the present tendency increases and something is not done to check the drop off in municipal work, municipal and State, municipal, State, and county.

Senator LA FOLLETTE. If the Federal Government should make money or credit available to the municipalities, how much construction do you think could be undertaken during the coming year?

Mr. HOGAN. I think the normal program could be kept up. Of course, the facilities of the municipalities and the States for doing work are greater than that, but I would think that now, if proper credit facilities were extended, that the normal municipal and State program could be maintained this year.

General Marshall, who was in charge of all Army cantonment construction during the war, stated:

Under these conditions it would appear probable that the construction industry for 1932 will be around $4,000,000,000, or less than 50 per cent of its probable normal. Expressed in other words, that means the percentage of reduction in construction from 1931 to 1932 will be the greatest yet had. The profound effect this might have upon the whole industrial fabric must be seriously contemplated.

Public works in the postwar period has mounted from 25 per cent to 33⅓ per cent of the construction industry. Through an increase of some 20 per cent to 25 per cent above that normal during 1931, the construction industry that year was maintained at about 75 per cent of normal. A drop off of public works to 50 per cent of normal during 1932 will almost certainly drop the entire construction industry to about 40 per cent of its normal. A ghastly statement in view of the unemployment situation.

So many detailed lists of public works have been prepared and so many suggestions made as to work to be included therein, I believe there is sufficient information already printed in the Government records to compile a volume well in excess of $5,000,000,000.

Again he said:

The construction industry is the one industry that the Government plays a large part in. The Government is permitting the industry to become the most depressed of all industries through not doing what it is urging other industries to do.

* * * * * * *

Senator LA FOLLETTE. General, in looking over the various types of public works which are outlined in the bill, and in view of your large experience, what is your judgment concerning the feasibility of getting those types of public works under way within a reasonably short period of time, provided the money is available and the emergency authority is given?

Mr. MARSHALL. There is no question but that it can be done. I have not the faintest question about that phase of the situation, not the faintest.

Mr. President, what is the situation that confronts us in the country to-day? Not only do we know, from a study of the statistical indices and from other information available, that there has been a continual and drastic decline in business throughout the country, but also we have ample testimony, taken by the committees of Congress and presented on this floor, to show the devastating effects of the decline in business upon the millions of people who have been thrown out of work and who have had their purchasing power destroyed. Admitting that there are not wholly reliable and adequate statistics concerning the number of unemployed at this time, I wish to refer to the testimony given by Mr. McGrady recently before a subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures. He said:

Now, what is the situation? In the last two weeks there have been 287,000 men and women thrown out on the streets without jobs. At this very hour to-day, from the most conservative figures, there are 10,867,000 people walking the streets. When we first came to the various committees to plead for help and for work and for bread, when we first appeared in favor of the La Follette-Costigan bill, there were approximately 6,200,000 without jobs and a conservative national leadership adopting a policy of "do nothing now; let us wait," and while they have been waiting the figures have gone up almost to 11,000,000 without any jobs at all.

In the New York Times for June 20, 1932, there appeared this dispatch:

Unemployment among all classes of workers in the United States now ranges between 9,000,000 and 11,000,000, according to the most reliable estimates. Official, up-to-date information as to the exact figure is lacking, however.

William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, announced in his June statement a revised estimate of 10,634,000 as of the end of March, 1932, saying that the federation's figure was conservative.

Based as it is upon Labor Department and Census Bureau statistics, the federation estimate is generally regarded as sound. Many officials prefer, nevertheless, to strike a range, placing 9,000,000 as a minimum, while many others put the figure at 10,000,000 in conversation.

Mr. President, I wish now to come to a discussion of the amendment which I have offered to the pending bill. The amendment provides that consideration in approval of these projects shall be given, first, to the facility with which the projects may be gotten under way at the earliest possible date. Second, to the amount of labor that will be employed, directly or indirectly. Third, the number and diversity of industries which will be affected, directly or indirectly, by the projects. Fourth, the value of the projects to the economic and social welfare of the country. And, fifth, economical administration of the work.

Recognizing that in a program of this magnitude flexibility must be provided, only the maximum limits have been set upon the various categories of projects—Federal, State, county, and municipal—which are authorized, thus enabling the administrator to adjust the program to meet the exigencies of the situation which may arise as it is put into operation.

Accordingly, the amendment provides that the emergency-construction fund shall be divided into four parts. Approximately one-tenth, or not to exceed over $650,000,000, is to be used to expand construction by Federal agencies, including river and harbor and flood control works, public buildings, forest roads and trails, irrigation and reclamation works, and other lesser projects. One billion dollars is set aside for additional grants for Federal cooperation with States on public-works construction. The amendment provides that the existing Federal-aid highway program shall be largely expanded, and that the Federal Government may contribute half of the cost, or $50,000 a mile, up to a maximum of $100,000 per mile.

Secondly, the bill extends, during the present emergency, the principle of Federal aid in three important directions: First, the construction of all highway bridges, the elimination of railroad grade crossings, and the elimination of important highway grade crossings.

The greatest part of the emergency fund, up to $3,750,000,000, is made available for loans to State and local governments. They have in the past carried on 90 per cent of public construction in the United States, and their public works contain the greatest promise of expansion.

Ninety per cent of public construction in 1928 would be $3,240,000,000 of public works which at that time were carried on by the local, State, and county governments. I have provided for $3,750,000,000, because here is the greatest opportunity to expand a gigantic construction program, and to spread the work into the communities where unemployment is reaping its ravages.

Mr. President, the burdens which local governments are already carrying not only make it difficult for them to enlarge their existing programs but have already resulted in a drastic curtailment in those programs, to which I adverted in my remarks.

It is not difficult to understand why the programs of the municipalities have been curtailed. I wish to refer to a resolution adopted by the Investment Bankers' Association of America on January 30, 1932.

I shall not read the whereases, but the resolution itself provides:

Resolved, That the board of governors of the Investment Bankers' Association of America is opposed to the extension of public improvements which would institute an increase in the bonded indebtedness of States and municipalities under present conditions, and that public officials be urged to adopt programs of strictest economy, adjusting expenditures to actual income, and restricting the issuance of bonded indebtedness to the end that taxation may be reduced and credit maintained.

The purposes for which the money which the amendment proposes to make available may be used include construction of Federal-aid highways, construction of other State, county, and municipal highways, streets and pavements, construction of bridges, water supply and sewerage works, building of flying fields exclusive of the purchase of land, establishment of parks and playgrounds exclusive of land purchases, construction of schools and other public buildings, elimination of grade crossings, and the building of fire-prevention lanes and other forestry construction work.

The fourth part of the fund provided in the amendment is to be used to initiate types of construction which it is hoped will be taken up by private enterprises and continued beyond the period of the emergency. An amount of not more than $100,000,000 is therefore set aside for loans on somewhat longer terms to limited dividend corporations organized for the purpose of constructing housing for the low-income groups and for the elimination of congested and slum areas. Full control beyond approval of specified emergency projects and proposals is vested in the administrator of public works under the amendment, subject to the requirement that loans to States and local governments and limited dividend corporations must also be approved by the emergency finance board, which is to fix the amount according to approved financial and banking principles. The board is to take into consideration the financial condition of the borrower, the ability of the borrower to obtain funds at reasonable rates from other sources.

To prevent the continuance of expenditures and the making of loans beyond the duration of the emergency, the bill provides for the termination of the emergency construction and of the sale of bonds as soon as industrial production, as measured by the index computed by the Federal Reserve Board, reaches five points below the average of 1923 to 1925.

In other words, this proposal outlines an objective to be achieved. It is not for the purpose solely of providing work to those who are jobless. It seeks to achieve an objective, a partial economic recovery, by launching a sufficiently large program and by carrying it forward until that objective is obtained. This is a program of $5,500,000,000 which will be put into operation as rapidly as possible, and which will be continued until industrial production as computed by the Federal Reserve Board reaches the figure of 95, which is 5 points below the average of 1923 to 1925. Once that is achieved, the amendment directs the administrator of public works to sell no further bonds and to enter into no further new contracts for construction.

Mr. President, every student of the theory of expansion of public works as a means of stimulating recovery in times of depression is agreed that the size of the program and its timing are essential to the successful employment of that theory. If we stop short of an adequate program then the money which we have expended will be lost in the continued decline of essential values and in the mounting of unemployment. Of course so far as the lesser program provides work for those who are unemployed it will be beneficial to those individuals, but I warn the Senate and the country that an inadequate program will only result in throwing good money after bad in so far as checking the downward economic trends is concerned. An inadequate program such as is provided in the Wagner bill will prove a tragic and a dismal failure.

Mr. President, we are facing a grave national emergency, graver than in all the history of the Republic, and I do not except the World War. Have Senators ever paused to consider what the economic and social consequences may be in losing the battle against depression? I say to you, Mr. President, that a program should be inaugurated at this time sufficient to achieve the objective of partial recovery. A lesser program is to abandon the country to the consequences of a continuation of the depression. I say to you, sirs, that if that takes place, graver results will come than though we had lost the World War.

At least 10,000,000 men and women are out of work. At least another 10,000,000 are working on part time. While we have had a short breathing space in bank failures, the continued decline of essential values will inevitably inaugurate another epidemic of financial failures unless the Congress acts in the emergency and adopts an adequate program.

Mr. President, the solvency of the surviving banking institutions, insurance companies, and savings banks, as well as industrial corporations, hangs in the balance. Drastic measures are necessary to prevent national paralysis and economic chaos. I am weighing my words, Mr. President, when I make such statements. I make them only because I feel it is my responsibility to speak my convictions after studying this problem for more than two and one-half years. Upon my responsibility as a Senator I warn my colleagues that those who vote against this amendment must assume full responsibility for the disaster that will follow the failure to undertake a bold program to save the situation.

Mr. President, the measures thus far adopted are merely devices to absorb the frozen assets of banks, railroads, and insurance companies, and to tinker with and liberalize the credit structure. Apparently the administration and the leaders in Congress on both sides of the aisle who have followed the administration could not see that the absorption of frozen assets of insurance companies, banks, and railroads produced by a decline in essential values could not permanently save those institutions or stimulate economic recovery because if those essential values continued to decline, as they have done ever since the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act and the Glass-Steagall Act were passed, they continued to freeze additional assets.

There is no hope that any of the measures thus far adopted will cause a rise of commodity and security prices. The public-works expansion proposed in the amendment embodies the only emergency program which holds out any hope of a rise in commodity prices. While I am ready and willing to admit that estimates, under either of the programs which are presented to the Senate, as to the number of persons who will receive employment, are mere estimates, the best calculations which I have been able to secure indicate that a $5,500,000,000 program would provide jobs directly to 1,500,000 persons and would give employment indirectly to an additional 3,000,000 persons.

Mr. President, I ask Senators to visualize what a well-balanced public-works program as embodied in the amendment would do in so far as its direct stimulus upon production is concerned. It will stimulate production all along the line. Basic industries, hardest hit in this situation, will directly and immediately feel its stimulus. Iron, steel, cement, brick, lumber, and the quarry industries—in other words, the industries that produce the building materials—will immediately feel the repercussion of such a program. Commodity prices will be stimulated from two directions. They will respond directly to the immediate demand for finished and semifinished products. The flotation of the bond issue, if properly handled, will contribute still further to offset the disastrous processes of deflation which we have been experiencing. It will have the same effect as the flotation of bonds during the war had upon commodity prices. It will inevitably cause them to rise.

Once commodity prices start upward the attitude of every consumer in the United States will be changed because it is a fact that people do not buy in a falling or declining commodity market. They buy only when commodity prices are stable or rising. It is true not only of the individual consumer but it is true of the merchant, it is true of the wholesaler, it is true of the manufacturer. Shipment of the finished and raw materials which such a program will provide will increase the earnings of the railroads.

Mr. President, we may loan all the money to the railroads which they can absorb and we will not provide an additional ton of traffic for them to haul. Adopt the program of this amendment and we will bring about the shipment of goods over the railroads to such an extent that they will be in a position to pay some of the loans which we have made to them instead of asking for more.

Mr. President, the wage salary loss in this depression is estimated to be in excess of $20,000,000,000. Six million farmers dependent upon agriculture have had their purchasing power either completely wiped out or greatly reduced. The gross income of the farmers has fallen from $11,000,000,000 in 1929 to $6,000,000,000 in 1931. In order to make strides toward economic recovery we must restore the purchasing power to the consumers on the farms and in the cities. If we are to attempt to revive industry and agriculture, the only way by which buying and production can be stimulated sufficiently is through the expenditure of huge sums by governmental authority—city, county, and State—for public construction. The workers employed, directly and indirectly, as a result of such a public-works program will be once more able to buy shoes and clothing, food, and other consumers' goods which now they are unable to buy or have bought only in limited quantities. Restored purchasing power will enable consumers once more to purchase not only the necessities but also some of the things which we have come to call luxuries.

A bond issue of the size proposed by the amendment will restore to circulation and to use a large part of the funds now lying idle because of the reluctance of those who have savings and capital to invest in the present market. In loaning money to the Federal Government large and small investors are not faced with the difficulty of forecasting the hazards to which private enterprises are subjected. They are certain that the bonds which they buy will be repaid, and the circulation through the channels of consumption and production of the money expended directly will multiply several times the effect of the expenditures proposed under the terms of the amendment.

Mr. President, I wish I had the time to refer to a study entitled "The Stabilization of Employment in Philadelphia," made under the direction of William N. Loucks, research associate of the industrial research department and assistant professor of economics at the University of Pennsylvania. I wish to direct attention to the chapter entitled "The Wage Payments to Philadelphia Laborers Resulting from Expenditures for Construction Work in Philadelphia." This very exhaustive and comprehensive study, Mr. President, was made of the public-works program of the city of Philadelphia. It was found that approximately 50 per cent of the money expended for public works in Philadelphia remained within the legal limits of that city; and, if the State of Pennsylvania were taken as the boundary, even a much greater percentage out of every dollar expended for public works in that city remained in the State of Pennsylvania.

According to this study the dollar spent for public construction is multiplied four times over in the process of going through the circuit from the city government to the contractor, to the wage earner, then to the merchant, then back to the producer of the consumer's goods, where the dollar is again split between wages and capital, and again is divided, and thus multiplies itself four times over as the expenditures go forward.

I ask unanimous consent, Mr. President, to insert at this point in my remarks a table entitled "Table 32," to be found on page 178 of this study, which shows a "Classified summary of the expenditures resulting from an original expenditure of $1,000,000 on construction work in the city of Philadelphia."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

TABLE 32.—Classified summary of the expenditures resulting from an original expenditure of $1,000,000 on construction work in Philadelphia[1]

[1] Minor discrepancies between various items in the table are due to the fact that portions of a dollar were disregarded in the calculations. For some of the calculations the limits of the turnover periods had to be shifted slightly from their original places as represented by the broken lines in Chart V.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it has been contended by the opponents of this program that bonds could not be sold, or if they were sold they would result in depressing the bond market, causing losses to existing owners of Government bonds. I wish to direct attention to the fact that on March 10 the Treasury offered $900,000,000 of Treasury certificates. The New York Times contained a dispatch of March 10, from which I quote:

Marking the heaviest oversubscription to a Government issue of securities in many months, the subscriptions to the $900,000,000 offering of Treasury certificates to go on the market March 15 amounted to $3,402,725,500, Secretary Mills announced to-night.

On June 10 the following dispatch appeared in the New York Times:

Treasury security issues of the offerings to be dated June 15 were heavily oversubscribed, Secretary Mills announced to-day.

For the $350,000,000 offering of 1½ per cent 1-year certificates the subscription was $1,653,799,000. For the $400,000,000 offering of 3 per cent 3-year notes the subscription was $1,143,548,400.

Mr. President, during the World War we sold $25,000,000,000 worth of bonds to the American people, and for what purpose? For the purpose of destroying human life; and yet it is contended that this Government can not to-day sell to the American people over a period of time five and one-half billion dollars worth of bonds for the purpose of construction and for the preservation of human life and American Government. In view of the oversubscription of the Treasury certificates, some of them running for a 3-year period, can it be contended that if a comprehensive, organized campaign were undertaken in this country similar to the ones which were conducted during the World War to sell Liberty bonds, the American people would not invest in those bonds? Mr. President, I have not lost so much faith in the American people and in their willingness to contribute to the Government provided the Government will launch a program which holds out hope of recovery from the situation which confronts us.

Mr. President, 31 leading economists in this country outlined a program not dissimilar to the one found incorporated in this amendment. I have, however, not provided for the $1,400,000,000 of Federal construction which they recommend, because it is my belief that in our past experience the Federal programs are slow in getting under way. They suggested $4,000,000,000 for State, county, and municipal works. I have provided a top limit of $3,750,000,000. As I pointed out a moment ago, 90 per cent of the public construction in the United States has over the last 10 years been carried on by city, county, and State governments; 90 per cent of public construction in 1928 amounted to $3,240,000,000. Mr. President, there can be no question that if this program were adopted by the Senate and the funds proposed to be provided were made available at reasonable rates of interest to cities, counties, and States, more than $3,000,000,000 of the amount provided in my amendment to be loaned to the cities and counties and States for their public-works programs would be absorbed in a very short period of time. It is well known that every State and every city and county of any importance in this country has projected its improvements into the future; it has more of its programs in the blueprint stage than has the Federal Government, and therefore more than $3,000,000,000 of this program could be launched in a short time.

The other day, in discussing his bill, the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] said that he knew of only two projects in the State of New York that could qualify under the bill which he is sponsoring. I ask what hope there can be for the unemployed in the city of New York under the Senator's proposal, as found in this bill, with only two projects eligible for inauguration, when, as a matter of fact, within a few months that city has abandoned $225,000,000 worth of its normal public-works activities because the banks refused to extend it credit, and demanded the curtailment of its public-works activities?

The same situation prevails in every city in America. The same situation prevails in practically every county and in every State in this country.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Will the Senator at this point very briefly summarize his argument to date by stating the exact amount of money that his amendment contemplates being spent, and then, secondly, very briefly, just how the unemployed are to be placed at work?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I have gone all over that once. I shall be glad to do it again. The Senator can readily ascertain how the program is divided if he will take the amendment, turn to page 4 and read the emergency-construction program. He will see that the largest part of the money provided for by the program—$3,750,000,000—is to be loaned to cities, counties, and States to carry on their public-works projects which they normally would be building now, but which they can not launch because of their inability to secure funds at reasonable rates.

One billion dollars would be available for Federal and State-aid projects. The Senator will find that on page 7, section 7. It is my judgment that the projects which would be launched first and most readily are the projects contained in section 7, which provides a billion dollars for Federal-aid highways, not to exceed $500,000,000 of which shall be apportioned under the highway act of 1921. I have raised the limitation to $50,000 a mile to provide for work within the metropolitan areas of cities; also $150,000,000 to meet 50 per cent of the cost to the State and their civil subdivisions of highway bridge construction without regard to the provisions of the Federal highway act.

Next, $250,000,000 is made available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of the elimination of railroad grade crossings. I think there is no doubt that every dollar of that could be spent. Practically all of these railroad grade crossings in every State in the Union have already had their plans and specifications drawn. May I also say to the Senator that that type of work produces a large percentage of hand labor, because the grading and the other things which are usually done by machinery on regular highway work can not be done by machinery on these overhead viaducts.

Also, not to exceed $100,000,000 is made available for meeting 50 per cent of the cost to the several States and their civil subdivisions of the elimination of highway grade crossings and the construction of by-pass roads. Many of these States with congested traffic conditions, through their highway departments, have already projected the elimination of some of these very dangerous highway crossings.

The plans are drawn, the specifications are ready, and if these funds were made available at reasonable rates of interest the dirt could begin to fly on those jobs within three months. As a matter of fact General Marshall, who had charge of a large percentage of the construction during the war, stated that in his judgment the dirt could be made to fly on the bulk of the projects provided for in my amendment within six months, a larger percentage within a year, and all of it within 18 months.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further at this point?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator will remember that when the original bill was before the Senate some time ago I voted for the so-called Costigan-La Follette bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I remember that; yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. At that time I introduced a bill extending the amount of work to be provided under that feature of the bill. The one objection I have to the so-called Wagner amendment or Wagner bill is that it will not do for my State anything that is very much worth while. I have considered the bill rather thoroughly, and the best I can figure is approximately five or five and a half millions that might go to Oklahoma if this bill should become a law. Of course that is fine so far as it goes; but a good part of that would be for material, and very little would be for labor.

For that reason, while of course I shall support the Wagner bill, yet I shall be very glad to give my support to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin.

Now the second provision: Will the Senator explain very briefly just how he proposes to raise the money with which to finance the works just outlined?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I am proposing to strike out the $500,000,000 public-works provision in this bill, and to substitute a provision for five and a half billion dollars' worth of bonds.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Does the Senator mean that those bonds are to be issued by the Treasury and sold to the bond-buying public?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It is contemplated that they would be sold by a nation-wide drive, just as Liberty bonds were sold during the war. I have not changed the committee amendment in that respect, because it is practically the identical language of the amendment which I had in my original bill, and I think both were taken from the Liberty loan acts. It provides for their sale in small denominations to the general public through a campaign; and I was just stating when the Senator interrupted me that in view of the oversubscription of these Treasury notes, and in view of the fact that we were able to sell $25,000,000,000 of bonds during the war, I have never been convinced that these bonds could not be sold if they were sold by the same methods that were employed during the war; namely, a nation-wide campaign to sell them on the borrow-and-buy plan.

There is alleged to be upward of a billion dollars in hoarding; and the sale of these bonds certainly would have a beneficial effect in bringing that portion of the circulating medium out of hiding and putting it to work.

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to direct attention to the appalling situation which confronts this country so far as the people who are in the front-line trenches of this depression are concerned. I, therefore, wish to refer briefly to some of the testimony on this subject given at a hearing before a subcommittee of the Committee on Manufactures on June 20, last Monday.

There appeared Dr. Sidney E. Goldstein, of New York City. I quote briefly from his testimony:

At the present time the reports that are coming to us all present a picture very much darker than anything that we have witnessed during the last 10 or 15 or 20 years in the United States. Now, this picture is now so dark that we feel that the time has come, Mr. Senator, not to plead any longer for the consideration of the bills, but to demand action on the part of the administration and the Congress. The situation is so grave that we are compelled to call your attention to two things: First of all to make provision for the relief of those who to-day are utterly without resources in the larger cities of the country and in the rural districts.

Those of us who are near to the working classes and to the unemployed, know that to-day in some cities it is even impossible for men and women who are out of work in desperate need to find the office to which to apply for assistance.

In New York City I regret to tell you that the offices of the Home and Work Relief Bureau established by the city of New York are closed, and have been closed since early in April. There is no place to which the unemployed can even apply for aid at the present time.

In New York City the conditions are growing worse and worse. Men and women and families are moving into basement tenements that were declared uninhabitable and condemned fully 25 years ago.

In view of the situation we are compelled to ask Congress to delay no longer in the passage of the bills that will meet the needs of the unemployed in an adequate and statesmanlike manner.

We are compelled to ask you to do two things. First of all, to provide relief—relief such as is called for in the bills that are now before the Senate and before the House.

Further on he said:

We dare to say this to you, that Congress must not adjourn until the problem of the unemployed has been met, until some arrangement has been made to provide people who are starving with food that they must have in order to be saved, and Congress must not adjourn until some provision has been made to launch the great construction program that we have again and again pressed upon Congress and that some Members of the Senate and some Members of the House, we are happy to say, have consistently also approved and urged upon their colleagues.

Further, he said:

If a great epidemic were to sweep this country, involving between 20,000,000 and 30,000,000 men and women, Congress would not hesitate to appropriate the necessary amount of money. If a flood were to overwhelm a large part of our population, Congress would not delay. If war were to break out and devastate our land, Congress would not temporize.

The crisis and catastrophe that are come upon us are just as great as an epidemic, are just as great as a war, are just as great as a flood. More people are suffering to-day than were suffering during the period of the war, and we ask Congress, both the Senate and the House, and the administration as well, to think now of the men and women who must be saved and not of other problems that to us are secondary in the life of the Nation.

I wish to read also a statement of Dr. James Myers, secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America:

Mr. Chairman, it is my conviction that our very form of government is facing a supreme test at this moment, not only as to its ability as a democratic form of government to act quickly and wisely enough to balance the Budget but also as to its ability and its determination to care for the millions of unemployed people who should be its chief concern.

I do not consider this a partisan issue, and it seems to me that if Congress adjourns without dealing with it adequately both parties will be morally culpable.

I should like to say that in regard to Federal aid it seems to me Federal aid, both for unemployed relief and public works, is absolutely essential and ethically justified because as you will hear more, and you have heard a great many times, there are a great many communities which are unable financially to take care of the situation. Places where whole industries have broken down, such as the bituminous-coal industry, rural sections, places where banks have failed and where tax limits have been reached, and so on.

I have visited in the course of the year a great many of these and I am very apprehensive of what is going to happen if something adequate is not done; and, secondly, the Federal Government alone has got sufficient taxing power and sufficient credit resources to handle the widespread calamity which is national, as this one is.

* * * * * * *

In regard to a large and adequate public-works program, I do not need to recount again that leading economists and engineers and students of government are in favor of this method, as perhaps the most constructive method of all.

I might say that the churches for three years have been pointing out the advisability of this kind of a program and hoping for action.

I should like to read a short statement, which it seems to me was particularly significant, because it was gotten out last January following a great conference held the year before by three great national religious bodies. This statement was gotten out by the Federal Council of Churches, joined with the department of social action of the National Catholic Welfare Conference and the social justice commission of the Central Conference of American Rabbis. It reads as follows:

"We believe that immediate and adequate appropriations should be made available by national, as well as local governments, for such needed and useful public works as road construction, development of parks, elimination of grade crossings, flood-control projects, reforestation, and the clearing of slum areas in our cities. If such a governmental program be undertaken now, we will face the months that lie ahead with prospects of work for a large number of the unemployed and consequently increased purchasing power which will stimulate all business. The economic wisdom of this proposal has been attested by leading economists."

Further, he said:

The church forces, as I take it, do not presume to lay down detailed methods and techniques to be followed in these matters. These things must be worked out by statesmen and economists and engineers, but I do feel that it is distinctly within the sphere of religious forces to point out the grave conditions that obtain and what they mean in terms of human life, and to point out also, Mr. Chairman, the moral responsibility of the Nation, and I may say a major responsibility, to care for its own. Only so, Mr. Chairman, does it seem to me that this very form of government under which we live and which we are proud of, only as it meets this moral responsibility as a nation to care for its own, only so shall we demonstrate to our own citizens and to the world that we are really a government of the people, by the people, and for the people.

Dr. Edward L. Israel, chairman of the committee on social justice of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, had this to say, among other things:

Now, you may ask why the concern of religious organizations in this solely economic problem. The reason for that has been given to you in the closing words of my colleague, Mr. Myers, but I may add that we have discovered, if we did not know it before, we have discovered in this economic crisis in which we now exist that there is an indissoluble connection between a health of body and a health of soul, and that if we are going to allow the economic sources of the land to degenerate, to become the prey of injustice, to become the prey of starvation, then all of the cultural and all of the spiritual efforts that we make to stabilize our civilization amount to nothing and can be swept away in a moment. It is in the interest of the preservation of the spiritual values in American life, of which we talk so fluently and for which we do so little, as well as in the name of justice for the suffering masses, the millions of our land that we of the religious bodies are here before you, and, after all, we recognize the fact that this crisis is not what we might call an act of God.

We have the instrumentalities of plenty. We have the resources. We have the ability. We have the energy. We have the man power whereby a strong and sound and decent economic life could exist in this country.

We live in the present crisis because of the incapabilities or the unwillingness of human beings to administer the universe in an intelligent, decent, and just manner, and so it becomes the responsibility of man and man has chosen government as a means whereby he can administer the social forces of life. And so, very logically, we come to you, the representatives of our Government, in order that justice and decency may be achieved in our present situation.

It becomes a national crisis. It becomes a matter for Federal aid.

* * * * * * *

A Justice of the United States Supreme Court said recently that we face an emergency even greater than any emergency caused by war, and we have to think of it in that term. We have to think of it not in terms of the bond market or the obligations to certain financial interests. We do not consider those responsibilities when the life of our Nation is at stake and we pour millions upon millions and more millions of dollars into the preservation of our national assets and what we regard at the moment to be the safety of the citizens of our land. From the lips of a United States Supreme Justice we hear that we face just such an emergency at the present moment, and it is a challenge to some of the physical resources of the country to meet that emergency for the benefit of our country and for its stability.

* * * * * * *

Let me say, too, whatever may be the objections of business organizations, that business is paralyzed. I have spoken to leaders of business in the course of my work and all that they do is come with a plea, "What can I do?"

* * * * * * *

It is more than an economic situation, gentlemen, it is the greatest challenge to the governmental life that we have ever known. It is the real question whether such a government has that power that no other government has ever had before in its existence.

Mr. McGrady, speaking for the American Federation of Labor, said:

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have no desire to be repetitious this morning. We have marched up this hill patiently for months pleading and begging the Congress of the United States and the leaders of the administration to do something to meet this great national crisis, and up to the present moment they have done very little or nothing. The pleadings of the people have been in vain.

The first gentleman who spoke to-day said that the Congress ought to do something to save the hungry. I want to assure you gentlemen that if the Congress of the United States and this administration does not do something to meet this situation adequately, next winter it will not be a cry to save the hungry but it will be a cry to save the Government.

Conservative leadership may be all right when the old ship of state is sailing along smooth waters, but conservative leadership was never any good in time of war and we are in a state of war against hunger and against poverty, and conservative leadership is not needed. We want bold, courageous, and intelligent leadership in this country and perhaps we will have that eventually unless this situation is going to be met.

Mr. President, I have quoted from statements because I wanted to impress upon this RECORD the gravity of the crisis which confronts this country. I could cite no more startling indication of the critical character of the emergency than the testimony which I have quoted from these conservative leaders of religious opinion, and this conservative representative of the American Federation of Labor.

Mr. President, here is the issue Senators must face on this amendment. Will they adopt a program of sufficient size to meet this emergency, or will they compromise, and reduce it to the point where it can accomplish nothing toward stimulating economic recovery? The Wagner bill is only a few steps in advance of a made-work relief program.

Mr. President, a further decline will produce a cataclysmic phase in this depression which will threaten the very foundations of Government itself. I have appealed all during the crisis for action on the part of the Government to save the millions of human beings who are being ground to bits in this process. My pleas for the most part have fallen on deaf ears; but that, sir, is no responsibility of mine. I have discharged to the full my responsibility in the situation.

I ventured at the outset of my discussion to review the record of this administration and of the bipartisan coalition in Congress which had followed it, because upon that record of dismal and tragic failure, which amounts to dereliction in duty, I wish to appeal to this body to now assert its leadership and to assume its responsibility by adopting a program commensurate with the magnitude and the gravity of this crisis.

Congress is about to adjourn, Mr. President. This is the last chance for Congress to act before next December. I appeal to members in this body to act now and to adopt a program adequate to meet this emergency lest, when we reconvene next December, it will be too late to act.

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. COSTIGAN. May I ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield.

Mr. COSTIGAN. To my regret, I have not heard all, though I have heard much, of the remarkably impressive address of the Senator from Wisconsin. May I ask if I am correct in assuming that the program of public construction advocated by the Senator is in part calculated to take up the slack of present unemployment, stimulate confidence, and start in motion the idle wheels of industry?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it is not calculated to provide direct or indirect employment for 10,000,000 who are now out of work, but it is calculated to provide a sufficient amount of employment, direct and indirect, and, through the distribution of purchasing power, to secure a revival of business generally which will provide employment for all who are out of work.

Mr. COSTIGAN. In other words, the Senator from Wisconsin hopes to initiate a movement which will help to bring about a restoration of more normal and prosperous industrial conditions?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. What I said in the course of my discussion of the amendment is that it sets an objective. It proposes that the program shall be continued until the index of industrial production reaches 95, which is 5 points below the average of 1923 to 1925. There is no use trying to prime this economic pump with a medicine dropper. We will only lose the water we pour down the pump. If we are to make the pump function again we must prime it with a large enough supply so the plunger once more will begin to work.

Mr. COSTIGAN. I do not know whether the Senator from Wisconsin has used or commented on certain statistics before me. The Census of Manufactures for 1929, a summary of which was published in Washington December 31, 1930, indicated that when the census was taken in 1929 there were, not including salaried employees, 8,742,761 factory workers employed in the United States; that the value, added by manufacture through their work in 1929, aggregated $31,687,061,130, and that the wages of those workers amounted to $11,421,631,054.

These statistics give some impression of the magnitude of the present unemployment problem over which the Senator from Wisconsin is justly concerned, and which he is wisely endeavoring to correct. The figures quoted point to gains in one year in national wealth, in addition to wages, through the labor of our factory workers in 1929 of more than $20,000,000,000. With unemployment at this hour exceeding the number of factory workers employed in 1929, some picture is given of the loss in wages, production, and markets for farm products, and general business. The figures emphasize that no public-works program, which gives promise of relief, is expensive when compared with the mounting cost of our continuing unemployment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I thank the Senator very much for his illuminating suggestion.

Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the RECORD at this point the table showing industrial production, freight-car loadings, and so forth, for various years, to which I have referred in the course of my remarks, and also an article from the United States Daily, entitled "Group of Mayors Asks Congress to Vote Aid to Cities."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

The newspaper article ordered to be printed in the RECORD is as follows:

GROUP OF MAYORS ASKS CONGRESS TO VOTE AID TO CITIES—FIVE BILLION EMERGENCY LOAN TO BE MADE AVAILABLE IMMEDIATELY IS PROPOSED TO PROVIDE EMPLOYMENT—REQUESTS FIVE HUNDRED MILLION TO FINANCE LOCALITIES—URGES RECONSTRUCTION CORPORATION BE AUTHORIZED TO REFUND MUNICIPAL BONDS AND SEEKS THREE HUNDRED MILLION DIRECT AID

Declaring Congress must not adjourn without adequate legislation to aid municipalities in meeting unemployment and other problems, a delegation of mayors and other heads of seven cities, at a meeting at the Capital June 7 asked Congress to provide a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan, immediately available, to put millions of men at work.

They conferred first with Speaker GARNER (Democrat), of Uvalde, Tex., and with him sat Representative RAINEY (Democrat), of Carrollton, Ill., the majority leader; and Representative SNELL (Republican), of Potsdam, N. Y., the minority leader. Later they presented their memorial to the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency.

REPRESENT 31 CITIES AND TOWNS

The nonpartisan delegation, authorized to present the memorial by a conference of representatives of 31 cities at Detroit, Mich., on June 1, comprised the following: Mayor James M. Curley, of Boston, Mass.; Mayor Frank Murphy, of Detroit, Mich.; Mayor Ray T. Miller, of Cleveland, Ohio; Mayor Daniel W. Hoan, of Milwaukee, Wis.; Mayor William A. Anderson, of Minneapolis, Minn.; A. Miles Pratt, director of finance, New Orleans, La.; and George Welsh, city manager, Grand Rapids, Mich.

They asked that Congress give consideration to immediate relief for the cities and towns of the United States. They also announced that their program, embodied in a memorial presented to Congress, will also be presented at the White House to President Hoover June 8.

The program, summarized, favors $5,000,000,000 for construction work as an emergency employment relief measure and an additional expenditure of $500,000,000 to be used for the refunding of maturing obligations of the cities, counties, and towns, with a further provision for $300,000,000 for direct aid to the cities, towns, and counties.

The memorial presented to the House leadership for the attention of Congress and to be presented to President Hoover follows in full text:

"I. Preamble: The world and the Nation are at war. The enemy is hunger. We have it on reliable authority that the extent of unemployment in the United States now equals that of all Europe combined—which means all the rest of the industrial world. This has precipitated an emergency unprecedented in modern times. Such a situation calls for the prompt, vigorous, and intelligent measures which war always makes imperative.

"We do not in any sense retreat from the position, fundamental in our democratic system, that in normal times municipal governments must maintain themselves, perform their proper functions, and solve the social and economic problems incident to such normal activity.

"But these are not normal times. It is a crisis, imminent and terrifying. The long period during which unemployment has continued and increased has created conditions of suffering and need nothing less than appalling.

SITUATION IN CITIES REVIEWED

"The cities of the Nation, large and small, have met these conditions with resourcefulness and courage. But all their resources of money and credit are nearing exhaustion. Relief must be found or nation-wide insolvency will result. Tax delinquencies have increased to an alarming extent under the burden of debts incurred as a result of the vast expansion of prosperous years. The interest and sinking charges on these obligations represent a wholly disproportionate burden at the present time due to the greatly increased purchasing power of the dollar.

"Even those municipalities which have instituted the most rigid economies in operation are now in a precarious situation. Not only welfare relief but essential governmental services are now threatened and the very foundations of our social order are imperiled. In the face of this threat against human welfare and human life itself measures must be employed as drastic as those of military authority in times of actual physical warfare.

PROBLEM DECLARED NATIONAL

"The problem is now a national one. The Federal Government is the only agency that represents all the people and is able to deal adequately with the emergency. It has the unlimited credit of the Nation, and by intelligent planning it can provide for the human welfare and security of its citizens.

"The measures we are advocating are entirely consistent with a sound fiscal policy and need not in any way disturb our national credit or stability. Hence the Federal Government is the one remaining source to which we can turn in this emergency, and we do so with confidence that wise and adequate assistance will not be denied.

"II. Recommendations: We, therefore, mayors, city managers, and representatives of 31 leading cities of the United States, called into conference at Detroit, Mich., June 1, 1932, after careful consideration of the facts set forth in this preamble, submit the following as a remedy in whole or in part for the critical conditions described:

URGE FIVE BILLION LOAN

"1. We recommend that a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan be made available immediately for national projects to effectuate the employment of millions of men in this manner to provide work for our jobless, redistribute purchasing power, and thereby stimulate industry. We recommend that this be done by Congress declaring war not figuratively but literally against unemployment and depression; and that to this end a work army be mobilized, as armies were mobilized in 1917–18, for work on national projects throughout the United States.

TAX RELIEF PROPOSAL

"2. We recommend the immediate enactment of such relief legislation as may be necessary to conserve the welfare of the American people during the present industrial depression.

"3. We recommend an amendment to the congressional act incorporating the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, or such other legislation as may be finally determined as advisable, to permit such corporation to invest its assets in notes, debentures, bonds, or other faith and credit obligations of cities for public welfare, to provide money for delinquent tax obligations and the refunding of bonds and obligations to release funds necessary to maintain the adequate and proper operation of municipal government.

"4. We recommend that copies of these resolutions be presented to the President and the Congress of the United States and be made available to the press of the Nation."

Mayor Murphy, as a spokesman, told the Speaker and the other two leaders that the sentiment of the country is back of the memorial, that the conference that put it forward embraced representatives of 31 representative cities.

He said the economic breakdown in the United States left the problem of unemployment up to the cities and towns and it is the great masses of the people in the cities that are affected by the present crisis. The cities, he said, have done everything within their power to help themselves and, in many cases, have exhausted their resources without cooperation of the Federal Government.

"We are not asking indiscriminate aid, but we are asking the direct cooperation of the Federal Government to relieve the distress where the resources of the cities are exhausted," Mr. Murphy said, "and to make the resources of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation available to municipalities wherever neccessary."

URGES CONGRESS TO ACT

He asserted that the municipality, the oldest corporate entity in the country, affords a sound security. He said that when the situation became acute two years ago, Congress should not have adjourned without relief legislation, and having adjourned it should have been called together in special session. The cities ask, he said, that Congress shall not adjourn without doing something to help the cities meet unemployment, tax delinquency, and refunding needs.

"We believe that 8,000,000 unemployed in the Nation must not be allowed to physically and spiritually deteriorate while waiting for solution of the country's problems," he said.

He told of enormous debt problems of the cities, contracted during the period of expansion and now a tremendous load on the cities; of tax delinquencies that began increasing in the cities two years ago and now reaching enormous figures with every prospect of continuing the coming year; of the transition problem in unemployment; the trek to the cities that began long ago; and of the legal limitations which handicap the cities under State laws and their own charters; and of the wider scope of relief opportunity on the part of the Federal Government.

He pointed out the nonpartisan character of the program presented. "The cities are here represented regionally and by every political faith," he said.

Describing the economic situation as "critical and terrifying," the needs of the cities as "appalling," the credit resources of many cities as well-nigh exhausted and tax delinquencies growing, he formally presented the cities' memorial. He said that in many cities the banks could not help the municipalities, and in some cases are not disposed to anyway, and so the cities have been "caught in a trap" in the matter of refunding and other problems. He said the problems are "tragic."

Speaker GARNER, referring to the delegation's $5,000,000,000 proposal, asked how that much money could be used. He mentioned the Garner-Rainey bill's relief plan involving $1,000,000,000 for construction, and said the executive branch of the Government had indicated it could not use economically more than $500,000,000 of that sum during the coming year.

RECONSTRUCTION LOANS URGED

Mr. Murphy said the Speaker's proposal relates to Federal projects and the amount the cities asked could be used by the municipalities. The Speaker agreed that he had referred to Federal projects and said the Reconstruction Finance Corporation loan facilities should be expanded so that corporation can loan to any legal entity on adequate security.

He said that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation can loan to the Pennsylvania Railroad or any other corporation to meet fixed charges, there is no reason why it should not loan to municipalities. He said he expects the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will be enabled to make loans to cities under a sound policy as to security.

FEDERAL AID DECLARED NEEDED

Mayor Curley said he wished Members of both Houses of Congress could make a trip through the United States and become familiar with the conditions. He said he is not asking financial aid for Boston, which city is in rather a fortunate condition, nor for New York, which, while it has a real problem, is in better condition than many of the cities.

In many cities, particularly away from the Atlantic coast and especially in the West, he said, there is real need for Federal cooperation. He said it is within the power of the Federal Government properly to expend not merely the $5,000,000,000 proposed but many times that amount if necessary.

He cited large and unquestioned expenditures in Holland. He told of improvement projects of considerable magnitude in Germany carried on with American money, and said Italy had been transformed in the past 10 years with American money. He said $2,000,000,000 alone could be expended properly on the Mississippi River and its tributaries in flood-control construction work immediately, with permanent results in decreased erosions, acceleration of stream flow, and development of communications and power and trade, with quicker return of prosperity all through the Mississippi Basin.

WARNS OF COMING WINTER

He denied that only $400,000,000 could be expended irrespective of amounts authorized. He said every steam railroad should be electrified and many other industrial projects could be carried out. He said he was fearful about conditions next winter in many of the cities away from the Atlantic seaboard.

"This is not the first year of the depression," he pointed out. "We are entering upon the fourth year, and I am fearful of the coming winter with 10,000,000 unemployed and millions of others with wages reduced and otherwise affected." Advocating the $300,000,000 for direct Federal aid for the distressed, he said: "We did not hesitate to feed the Belgians and the Russians." He said there never was a more serious problem in the country, but the country is able to meet it.

CONDITIONS IN WEST CITED

Speaker GARNER said Congress has found it necessary to take the lead in a relief program, and he agreed legislation should be enacted to meet the situation.

Mr. Curley criticized banks for refusing to loan money to municipalities, although they had not failed to make loans abroad. He said industrial cities in the West, with revenues depleted, with banks refusing to make advances to the municipalities, have only the Federal Government to turn to. He said the mere announcement the Federal Government proposes to grant the relief asked for would convince every private employer that the tide has turned.

One mayor asked if there is any doubt that 1,000,000 or 2,000,000 men could be put at work at once if there are funds available. The Speaker said he thought it is quite true they could be. He said, however, he could not say just what Congress will do. He said the Garner-Rainey relief bill would put $100,000,000 immediately in the hands of the President to use in any way that seemed necessary, but the President has said he does not want that fund.

WELFARE WORK CITED

Mayor Murphy said what they are concerned with is relief to save the people, and he did not care whether it is called a dole or not. He also pointed out that it has taken a quarter of a century for cities to build up standards of welfare work, such as child welfare institutions and institutions for indigent mothers, and so on, and now that whole welfare fabric is being ripped to pieces in this economic readjustment.

DIRECT RELIEF FUND SOUGHT BY MAYORS—DELEGATION ASKS PRESIDENT TO FAVOR FIVE BILLION LOAN TO PROVIDE WORK

President Hoover's support for legislation by Congress for direct unemployment relief funds for municipalities was urged June 8 by a delegation of mayors and other city representatives headed by Mayor Frank Murphy, of Detroit, Mich., who conferred with him at the White House.

Specifically, the delegates asked President Hoover to favor a $5,000,000,000 prosperity loan to be made immediately available by Congress to provide work for idle men in the cities and municipalities as called for in a resolution which they presented to Congress on June 7. (The resolution was printed in full text in the issue of June 8.)

Mayor Murphy laid the resolution before President Hoover and then outlined the case of the municipalities' unemployment relief problems to him.

FEDERAL AID SOUGHT

"The Federal Government," said Mayor Murphy, after conferring with the President, "ought to play a part in a cooperative plan for direct relief to aid distress and eliminate the lack of uniformity in relief. We appealed to the President for a $5,000,000,000 bond issue. It would be some time before this could go into effect, but it would take up the idle men. Meantime, we need direct relief.

The prolonged idleness of men has created a new social problem which makes direct relief to the States absolutely necessary."

Mayor Murphy stated orally that President Hoover discussed the resolution with them "very frankly." He expressed sympathy with the problem of the States, the mayor added.

"President Hoover," he said, "is in favor of his own program of relief as being the most practical one."

ADEQUATE FUNDS URGED

The President's announced program calls for authorization to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to loan $300,000,000 to relieve distress, in addition to other provisions.

"That program," said Mayor Murphy, "is inadequate to meet the situation. It ought to be proportioned to the States that need it. It seems superficial to just set up $300,000,000 to go around the country."

Mayor Murphy said that their next move to secure relief would be to confer with Senators and Representatives and probably to memorialize Congress on the subject.

In addition to Mayor Murphy, the delegation embraced Mayor James M. Curley, of Boston, Mass.; Mayor Ray T. Miller, of Cleveland, Ohio; Mayor Daniel W. Hoan, of Milwaukee, Wis.; Mayor William A. Anderson, of Minneapolis, Minn.; A. Miles Pratt, director of finance of New Orleans, La.; and George Welsh, city manager of Grand Rapids, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-seven Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

AMELIA EARHART PUTNAM

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the Senate to-day unwittingly did a very great disservice to a very gallant lady. We agreed to the House amendments to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 165) authorizing the President of the United States to present the distinguished-flying cross to Amelia Earhart Putnam. The House amended the joint resolution to give her the distinguished-service medal. The amendment of the House was, on page 1, line 4, to strike out "flying cross" and insert "service medal," and to amend the title so as to read: "Joint resolution authorizing the President of the United States to present the distinguished-service medal to Amelia Earhart Putnam."

The House made the amendments on the theory that giving her the distinguished-service medal was recommended by the War Department. It was purely an error on the part of the House in misinterpreting the letter from the War Department, and it was purely an error on the part of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] and of the Senate in acquiescing in the House amendments.

The facts are that Colonel Lindbergh was given the distinguished-flying cross for his exploit, that the Germans who first flew westward across the Atlantic were given the distinguished-flying cross, that the Frenchmen and Italians who made those gallant flights across the South Atlantic were given the distinguished-flying cross, and nobody meant to discriminate against Mrs. Putnam in that way. She clearly is entitled by her gallantry to the same treatment that was accorded the others.

In the request I am about to make I have the acquiescence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], who introduced the joint resolution. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the House amendments were agreed to may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I inquire if the joint resolution is in the possession of the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. REED. I now move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, ask a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. REED, Mr. WALCOTT, and Mr. FLETCHER conferees on the part of the Senate.

FURLOUGH OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES

Mr. COOLIDGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask unanimous consent to have read two telegrams which came to me to-day from Boston and Lawrence, Mass., with reference to furloughs and possible dismissals of customs employees, and a proposed abolishment of the Lawrence port.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Without objection, the telegrams will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

BOSTON, MASS., June 22, 1932.

Hon. MARCUS COOLIDGE,
United States Senate:

Informed customs appropriation cut severely, which means furlough additional to one month in economy bill, with possible dismissals. Customs employees protest this added hardship and urge you to oppose same.

C. FRED LAMB,
President Boston Branch National Customs Service Association.
JOSEPH J. CURRAN,
First National Vice President.

LAWRENCE, MASS., June 22, 1932.

Senator MARCUS A. COOLIDGE,
United States Senate:

April 27 we wrote you regarding Lawrence customs port of entry that duty receipts Lawrence exceeded by over $100,000 combined receipts all other Massachusetts ports except Boston. Note to-day's Boston paper proposed abolishment Lawrence port. We urge your immediate cooperation to keep Lawrence port maintained. Local woolen mills ordinarily employing 25,000 affected. Closing Lawrence port will increase Government expenses several thousand dollars. Trucking and handling now being done by local factory employees at no expense to Government. Government expense increased through necessary additional employment of laborers Boston. Lawrence port absolutely essential to local industries. Abolishment local port means greatly added expense and loss of time to local importers.

LAWRENCE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

ADJUSTED-COMPENSATION CERTIFICATES

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, before this session closes I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Senate and the country to the parliamentary record made during and just after the vote was had on the so-called bonus bill. This record is found on pages 13274 and 13276 of the RECORD of June 17.

Shortly before the vote was taken, at the close of my address I said:

Mr. President, I shall vote for this bill. At the same time I will keep a close tabulation of the votes and before the result is announced, if my forecast is correct that the bill is to be defeated, I will change my vote from "yea" to "nay." I shall do it for but one purpose, and that is in order that I may enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill fails of passage. Immediately after the vote is announced I will enter a motion to reconsider the bill, in the hope that we may yet secure enough votes to pass the measure.

After the roll was called, and before the result was announced, I addressed the Chair and said:

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (after having voted in the affirmative). Mr. President, I desire to take no chance, and I change my vote from "yea" to "nay," with the idea of entering a motion to reconsider if the opportunity shall present.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 62.

Immediately after the vote was announced I addressed the Chair, and the RECORD shows the following:

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I rise to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bonus bill just failed of passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That motion will be entered.

Immediately thereafter the RECORD shows the following:

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I enter the motion, which means that I give notice that at some future date the motion will be called up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has a right to enter the motion; but the motion can not be proceeded with, because there is already a motion pending.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Is the notice just given of entrance of a motion at this time acknowledged by the Chair?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

With the motion for reconsideration entered, to be called up for consideration at some future date; with such motion entered, received, and acknowledged by the Chair; with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] having and holding the floor; having made his motion to "proceed to the consideration of H. R. 12445, being the bill to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation," and so forth; with my motion entered and with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] having a motion pending, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] moved immediate reconsideration of the vote by which the bonus bill was defeated. At this point the RECORD shows the following:

Mr. REED. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bonus bill was just defeated.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What is the point of order?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The point of order is that I myself have given notice that at some future time I would move to reconsider the vote; and that that notice having been received, a motion to reconsider at this time is out of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The giving of a notice is not a motion; and under the rule the motion can be made at any time within two days. The Chair holds that the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania is in order.

So eager were the leaders of the majority to end all misery and definitely kill the bill that in quick succession two motions were made to lay the Reed motion on the table—the first motion by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and, immediately following, an identical motion by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. The chair entertained the motion to table made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES]. The RECORD is as follows:

Mr. MOSES. * * * I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Following the motion to table, the RECORD shows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] to lay the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] on the table.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 26.

So the motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

And the bonus bill was dead.

Mr. President and Senators, the Chief Executive vetoed this bill in advance of its passage; then, with a vote of 62 to 18 against the veterans, the administration forces, flushed with victory and mad with power, proceeded to give the hopes of the heroes of other days the coup de grâce.

At the very moment when the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] was forcing the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] from the floor; at the same identical time when the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], and the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] were breaking established rules as old as the Senate itself, and during those self-same moments when the Presiding Officer was making new precedents with his unfamiliar rulings, just outside the Senate Chamber and massed across the Capitol Plaza some 20,000 ragged and hungry veterans—some with congressional medals of honor, some with distinguished-service crosses, and many with foreign decorations, but all with heavy hearts and uncovered heads—were singing:

My country, 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty.

History will contrast, appraise, and affix the relative merits of the respective acts of the Senate and the veterans on that historic night.

BRANCH BANKING AND UNIT BANKING

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by C. B. Axford, editor of the American Banker, on the subject of branch banking and unit banking, which article was published in the issue of May 9.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

BRANCH BANKING NOT AS SAFE AS UNIT BANKING—BRITISH AND UNITED STATES LOSSES COMPARED—A VOTE FOR GLASS BILL STATE-WIDE BRANCHES IS DEATH WARRANT FOR LOCAL BANKS—WHY SUBSTITUTE DISCREDITED FOREIGN SYSTEM FOR 100 PER CENT SAFETY GIVEN BY 20,000 AMERICAN BANKS?

Is unit banking to be doomed?

It is if the Glass bill passes with its present provision giving national banks branches everywhere in every State. Yet the change to branch banking would give the country a poorer system of banking, a dubious survival of the new-era dreams of 1929.

Once officially fostered, branch banking will slowly but inevitably destroy unit banking and the harm can never be undone.

In this belief the editor of the American Banker is carrying a personal campaign from a sick bed to every Member of Congress to have the branch-banking provisions amended out of the Glass Banking Act of 1932.

The first letter to this purpose is printed below. Other telling arguments will follow.

MAY 7, 1932.

HONORED SIR: Within a few weeks, now, as a member of the most representative governing body on earth, you will have the opportunity of signing the death warrant of your home-town banks.

You may not clearly realize it. But if you vote for the Glass Banking Act of 1932, with its degenerative branch-banking provisions, your local banks are doomed.

Are you for or against such a prospect?

You will be told the half truth that branch banking is necessary to make our banking system safer. The dubious examples of Great Britain and Canada, where "there have been no bank failures," will be pointed to as convincing "evidence" that branch banking is safer than unit banking. Heaven help these United States if your good sense does not cause you to smile a little.

We thought new-era economics fell ill in 1929, died in 1930, and were buried forever in 1931.

But enough, unfortunately, still lives of the errors of 1929 to tempt you with the half-truth arguments that branch banking is better for your people.

Half truths indeed!

For will these branch-bank survivors of the era of error tell you the other half of the story of branch banking, the discredited half?

No banks have failed in Great Britain and Canada? What is the crash of the British gold standard but the greatest bank failure of history, in which the unwieldiness of the branch-banking system was a major cause?

BRITISH AND AMERICAN BANK LOSSES COMPARED

No losses in bank failures in Great Britain? What else is the fact that the pound sterling dropped in purchasing power from $4.85 to $3.25 in gold, silver, or wheat, or other commodities almost immediately?

Owners of British bank deposits worth nearly $12,500,000,000 found nearly a third, i. e. $4,000,000,000—we estimate, wiped out over night. With all our losses in this country's bank suspensions, no such figure as this will ever be reached. Of our $56,000,000,000 in deposits, only some $5,000,000,000 has been tied up for liquidation in bank failures and less than a third of this will be seen to be lost when the liquidation of our suspended banks is completed.

A little more than a billion lost to Americans in unit banking or about 4 per cent, while Britishers have lost $4,000,000,000 or about 30 per cent. And the end of the British currency depreciation is not yet.

Meanwhile, millions of Americans in the vast majority of our banks have 100 per cent of their money on deposit, safe, available—theirs when they need it most, and it is worth more to them than ever before in buying power, a genuine reward for their thrift.

Branch banking was inevitably a factor in the breaking of the Bank of England. Mismanagement of British public finances was paralleled by a banking system in which deflation could not be localized as it has been in the United States. The pyramid of centralized banking and finance could only be readjusted by the disaster of currency revaluation.

Why substitute any step toward this discreditable system for the safety of which 20,000 unit banks have given 120,000,000 Americans?

This is the dark side of the "no bank failure in England or Canada" argument.

FRENCH-GERMAN BREAKDOWNS OF BRANCH BANKING

Similar disasters have overtaken the French and German branch-banking systems. Branch banks with more than 200 branches have closed in France, quite exploding the idea over there that branch banking is failure-proof, while other branch systems have had to be helped by the French Government. In Germany the centralized branch-banking system has broken down entirely and is now almost wholly subsidized by the German Government. (See current April edition of the National Sphere, Washington, D. C., under Failure of Branch Banking in Germany.)

BRANCH BANKING MEANS CENTRALIZATION AND INCREASE OF WALL STREET DOMINANCE

However, the dismal example of the failure of branch banking in the British Empire, France, and Germany is only one of the full truths which should make you hesitate a long time before you attempt to justify the octopus idea to your constituents.

What is to be the effect upon your communities when a lending policy rationed from Wall Street dictates the uses to which the funds saved by your people shall be put?

Make no mistake. This is what the advocates of branch banking were aiming toward in 1926 when they "strengthened" the banking system with the branch-banking privilege for the first time. It is what they are aiming at now.

Do you want your communities starved for credit? Oh, we know that your British and Canadian branch bankers deny that their systems work that way. But they do not tell you that in a section of Alberta the dairymen are using creamery checks for money and that in many parts of Canada, where there is still hope for local expansion, a substantial body of public opinion thinks highly of the unit banking system of the United States.

COUNTRY-BANK MANAGEMENT COMPARES FAVORABLY WITH FINANCIAL CENTERS

After our experiences of 1929–1931 we should have no illusions about city-bank management being safer per se than small-town banking. The hundreds of millions of dollars—the figure for charge-offs for 19 large banks in the last 12 months is $207,310,634—lost by New York City banks alone should serve as evidence that city-bank management has much to learn. Only the fortuitous accident of huge stock-market profits through sale of their shares at boom prices gave these city banks capital resources to stand the losses that they have announced to their shareholders. And hundreds of unfortunate country banks will testify that they lost most heavily, where they could least afford it, in bonds recommended for their vital secondary reserve accounts by their big-city correspondents.

The 18,000 or 19,000 small-town banks of this country which have managed their affairs so well as to ride the storms of the times unshaken are open challenges to the superiority of city-bank management.

Many of the smaller banks that failed are ghastly victims of the investment advices and called loans given them by city banks.

Yet all but a few of these 18,000 or 19,000 good small-town banks are doomed as surely as the branch-banking illusion gains ground.

Inevitably, any further extension of branch banking means an irretrievable step toward putting the key banking resources of your community more at the disposal of the big financial centers and the stock markets. There is no alternative.

How easy and inevitable you will make the administration of your State's banking from Wall Street if you vote to permit national banks to have branches everywhere in every State!

Do you, Mr. Member of Congress, want this?

Your vote on the Glass bill, as long as it contains the present branch-banking provisions, will be the only answer your constituents need.

In the solid faith of 96 years of service to the banking profession that independent banking is better banking.

Faithfully yours,

C. B. AXFORD, Editor.

LOANS TO STATES—SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program and providing a method of financing such program, the pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the amendment reported by the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, in the beginning of the history of the Republican Party it was organized against the institution of slavery. It was organized in the interest of the lowliest of our American people. It was organized upon the same principles of equal rights to all and special privileges to none that had been promulgated by the greatest Democrat of all times, Thomas Jefferson. But, Mr. President, in these days the Republican Party has drifted away from those humane moorings and we find it meeting under the direction of a convention which was controlled in every detail by the great financial interests of the country. Even one citizen who tried to speak on the other side of these questions was excluded from the platform and taken away. I think no convention has ever met in this country so absolutely dominated by the sinister financial influences of the country as was the Republican convention which recently assembled in Chicago.

Mr. President, among the common people of the country who have supported the Republican Party, Republican tickets, and Republican policies have been the farmers of the United States, except possibly the farmers of the Southern States, who at one time followed the institution of slavery. In the recent convention, the crowd of Wall Street politicians, headed and dominated by Ogden Mills, entirely disregarded the rights of the farmers of the United States. That convention ran away from the Republican platform of four years ago. I think that is probably true of many other questions, but certainly it is true of the agricultural question. Agriculture was kicked out of the back door and told to go hence for its relief and for its rights. Mr. President, I find this remarkable statement in the Republican platform adopted at Chicago:

> The people themselves, by their own courage, their own patient and resolute effort in the readjustments of their own affairs, can and will work out the cure. It is our task as a party, by leadership and a wise determination of policy, to assist that recovery.

For the first time in the history of the great Republican Party it does not assert its confidence in its ability to handle the situation and restore prosperity. For the first time in its history it throws up the sponge and says:

> The people themselves, by their own patient and resolute effort in the readjustments of their own affairs, can and will work out the cure.

So the people themselves must find the cure, if there be one, for this depression.

It is my purpose to-night to discuss the agricultural plank in the platform and to make plain to the Senate and to the country that, so far as agriculture is concerned, the convention said to them, "You must work out your own salvation; there is no help to come to agriculture from the Republican Party."

Mr. President, that brings up the question of finding the proper place of agriculture in reference to the existing depression. What is its part and what has caused agriculture to become depressed, and what has caused the other industries of the country to fall into depression?

Mr. President, as a usual thing we read that this depression was caused by the World War. That is a convenient statement to make when one is seeking an alibi for the things the big financial crowd in this country have done to produce this depression. I have said and I say again that the World War did not cause this depression. Again, I want to submit a few facts in support of that conclusion.

At the beginning of the war we were a debtor nation; we owed other peoples five or six billions of dollars. In a little while, out of war profits, we paid all those debts. Finally, after realizing other enormous war profits, we ourselves entered the war. Our Government then taxed war profits and was able to lend some $11,000,000,000 to foreign peoples and to foreign countries out of taxes levied on war profits. Then private parties, private institutions, collected enormous war profits, greater than those collected by the Government. They also were able to lend enormous sums to foreign peoples and foreign countries and to invest other enormous sums in foreign countries. The chairman of the Committee on Finance, the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], informed me that the total of those loans and investments is something like $45,000,000,000.

Mr. President, I am willing to concede that these vast loans and vast investments abroad, in countries that probably can not or will not repay them, are a part of the cause of this depression, but in 1922 our national wealth was $320,000,000,000. Those loans, while they are vast in amount, would not of themselves have caused the depression in the United States.

Those loans and investments represented financial operations apart from the war, and were not necessarily made because of the war. They were made because of the financial policy of the ruling financial forces of our country. Therefore, in so far as they helped to cause the depression, its cause was financial and not due to the war itself.

However, Mr. President, there were other causes particularly that produced the agricultural depression; the making of these loans had nothing whatever to do with the beginning of the agricultural depression. We have got to look entirely for local causes in our country, and those causes, as I have said, were due to laws, mainly those enacted by the Congress of the United States and to some extent those enacted by certain States. Briefly to-night, as a prelude to the expression of my idea and of my efforts to picture the situation, I will mention those laws.

The transportation act of 1920 was the first. That act caused an increase in railroad rates upon farm products of about 60 per cent over the pre-war level. That put a burden, of course, upon agriculture, and was the cause of the beginning of the agricultural depression.

Then the next set of laws that oppressed agriculture were the banking laws, both State and National, which in their operation gave interest rates to gamblers in Wall Street as low as 1 per cent or 2 per cent or 3 per cent, while agriculture was charged from 6 to 12 per cent in the various States of the Union. This banking system by its operation discriminated so heavily against agriculture in the matter of excess interest charges that it contributed somewhat to the agricultural depression. But the greatest of the causes of agricultural depression from the operation of the banking system was the deflation policy of the Federal Reserve Board in 1920.

I have so many times given the details that I will not repeat them to-night, but I will restate the result of that deflation policy as stated by the Manufacturers Record, whose estimate is not far different from that of the Agricultural Department itself. The policy which was then pursued deflated agriculture in 1920 and 1921 in the sum of $32,000,000, about $18,000,000 being upon land values and the other $14,000,000 on the two crops of 1920 and 1921; and, Mr. President, agriculture went down in depression as a result of that blow. The total value of agricultural property at that time was about $79,000,000,000, and $32,000,000,000 of it was stricken down all at once. There never was such a panic in farm prices in all the history of agriculture as we had late in 1920 and throughout 1921; and agriculture has stayed down in depression ever since; there has been no substantial revival.

Those engaged in agriculture constitute a third of the buying power of the people of this country; and a third of the buying power of the whole country can not be stricken down for a long period of years, continuing as in this case since 1920, without bringing on a general depression. This striking down of agriculture then, added to the vast loans which have since become uncollectible, even the interest not being paid on most of them, finally brought the rest of the country to depression.

However, before that happened, in 1922 there was a general revival of other business, but not of agriculture. Other business went into an enormous inflation, it being in 1929 the greatest in the history of the world. Then, on the 24th of October of that year the bubble burst, the great stock-watering scheme of the big corporations whose stock is listed on the stock exchange in New York collapsed; and, so interrelated are all the industries of the country, that the bursting of that inflation injured every other business, and agriculture, already down, was injured certainly more than any other business in the country.

I have here a chart showing the declines of movements among wholesale prices during the current recession since 1929. On this chart, all other than farm products and foods declined from an assumed basis of 100 down to about 75; but agriculture, farm products as a whole, declined to about 47. So the panic of 1929 had a greater effect upon agriculture than upon any other line of business; and that was another discrimination against agriculture. I have not mentioned the discrimination in the deflation of 1920 and 1921. The Manufacturers Record said that agriculture was deflated $32,000,000,000, and other business about $18,000,000,000 more, making a total of fifty billions.

Mr. President, at that time agriculture was about one-fourth of American business—it is now about one-seventh, since the deflation—and other business was about three-fourths. So, under the estimate of the Manufacturers Record, the deflation of other business, eighteen billions on three-fourths, as against thirty-two billions on one-fourth, being agriculture, that means, if you figure it out, that agriculture was deflated about six times as much in proportion as the other business of the country.

But, Mr. President, other business was not evenly deflated, because, as I have shown so often, the big business of the country was informed as to the coming of this deflation policy and went out and gathered up the surplus credit of the country and protected itself largely against the deflation; so that most of that $18,000,000,000 of business deflation fell upon the little business of the country rather than the big business of the country.

So think of that discrimination against agriculture in 1920 and then think of these figures, this chart that I have just given you, showing a further heavy discrimination as against agriculture when the panic of 1929 occurred.

I think the tariff laws have contributed to the agricultural depression in a general way, because under the tariff law the protected industry fixes the price of its product at its factory without foreign competition. Agriculture, however, is on a different basis. We shall soon see, in reviewing the Republican platform, that agricultural tariff rates are not effective because of the agricultural surplus that is sold in foreign markets and is not financed so that it can be removed and separated and segregated from the domestic market.

Every other business, when it has an exportable surplus, is financed. Every other business will separate that surplus out, and will not offer it for sale even in the domestic market at all. It will ship it abroad to the best world market it can find, and get the best price it can, usually lower than the price charged the people at home for the same product. But agriculture, not being financed, is not able to separate its surplus from the domestic market. Therefore, it is forced to sell it in the domestic market, and thereby it floods the domestic market by the amount of that surplus; and it is that flood that breaks down the tariff protection.

So the farmer is forced to buy in the high level of the protected American market the manufactured products that he needs, and then is forced to sell his own products on the low level of the world at the price fixed by the sale of his little surplus. That surplus is only about 10 per cent, on an average. It is about 50 per cent of cotton, about 20 per cent of wheat, less than 1 per cent of corn, less than 1 per cent of oats, and only 7 or 8 per cent of livestock products. These little percentages, Mr. President, are fixing the farmer's whole price, and they are sold in the free-trade market of the world. That adds to the agricultural depression. It adds heavily.

Then the patent laws and the corporation laws, which I will not discuss in detail, contribute their share to holding agriculture in economic slavery.

Mr. President, there is one other idea in reference to this depression that is new.

We have had eight major depressions in the last 50 years. I had the chart of that on the wall of the Senate Chamber not long ago. It was prepared by Colonel Ayres, of the Cleveland Trust Co., the most famous and efficient statistician of our time. In all of those depressions up to 1920, in all six that preceded 1920, agriculture came out first and best; and why was that?

Most of the agricultural lands had been obtained by the farmers of the western country, where most of it is located, at $1.25 an acre. Railroads got vast tracts, 158,000,000 acres—four and a half States as big as my State of Iowa, for that matter—for nothing, and then they sold it for from five to ten dollars an acre to the farmers of the country.

From these low prices land advanced steadily year after year. This advancing value of land kept the buying power of agriculture intact. When a panic came along agriculture could still buy. Agriculture had credit. Its credit was not destroyed. Agriculture, being in that condition, revived first and gradually pulled other business out of these depressions.

Prior to 1920 land values advanced more rapidly than in any like period, and then halted when the deflation of 1920 was put on; and since that date land values have been declining, and are still declining to-day.

During the past year the decline of land values has been greater than in any year of this agricultural depression—because I draw a distinction between the beginning of the agricultural depression and the general depression in the country. These things have broken down the buying power of agriculture, and have almost entirely destroyed its credit; and agriculture, therefore, is not helping to extricate us from this depression. So we go down deeper and deeper.

When Colonel Ayres was on the witness stand before the Banking and Currency Committee, I pointed out this situation to him from his own chart. Through that chart he had drawn a line representing the normal level of business. When business was in boom, the tracing line rose above this center line of normal level, and when business was in depression the tracing line fell below this normal level. I asked Colonel Ayres to tell what portion of that 50 years we had been on his normal line, the normal level of business. He seemed to be stumped by that question and hesitated in his answer. Then I answered it for him, and I said I had measured along that line myself, trying to figure out what portion of this 50 years was normal, and I had not been able to find 30 minutes in the whole 50 years. He said that was about right; that we had either been climbing up into inflation all the time or dropping down into depression. I then asked him if we had yet reached the bottom of the present depression, which he described as the greatest of all, and he said we were not yet at the bottom. I asked him how long it would take to get out of this after we had reached bottom, and he said, following the history of all depressions, it would certainly take longer to get out than it did to get in.

So, Mr. President, that is the sentence of big business that enacted this railroad law, that put $7,000,000,000 of water into railroad values as a basis of levying rates, raised farmers' rates by 60 per cent, enacted and controlled the Federal reserve administration, deflated the farmers of this country in the sum of $32,000,000,000, controlled this tariff system, controlled the patent system, and controlled the corporation laws of the country, which has brought about these various discriminations, and plunged agriculture down into the present condition, and thereby pulled other business down into this depression. When agriculture went down, and was no longer able to buy, that stopped many of the wheels of industry. That discharged men by the thousands and finally by the millions. As these men were discharged, that reduced and destroyed their buying power, and that stopped other orders into other industries and caused other unemployment, until now nine or ten million or perhaps more are unemployed and many more are working on part time. That is what has happened in this great country, which had an income for furnishing just the necessities of life without a business boom last year of over $60,000,000,000, while in 1930 it was about $71,000,000,000, and in the boom year of 1929 it was about $90,000,000,000.

Mr. President, that indicates that our economic system has broken down—broken down in the hands of the very powers that control and direct it. It is the great financial forces of this country that managed and produced all of these results. The first bad management was those vast loans abroad; and then the other bad management was the giving of these special privileges to various industries in our country.

I must complete this picture by repeating the fact of our national production in the United States.

All our labor, all our capital, all increase in property value and everything else, when we take the long series of years and rub out these ups and downs of business and get an average along that normal level line, amounts to a wealth increase of a little less than 4 per cent a year. That is all there is in this American pool of production, and that is all there ever has been. You can go clear back to the Declaration of Independence and begin at that date, and our wealth, including the value of all new territory, all new cities, all new improvements, everything, has increased at the rate of a little less than 4 per cent a year; and I suspect that if we should bring it up to date, on present depreciated values, it would drop considerably below 4 per cent. From 1912 to 1928 it was at the rate of about 4¼ per cent. I am sure if we bring it up to date, it will fall still below the general 4 per cent average which the country has had throughout its history.

Mr. President, if 4 per cent is all there is in this American pool production and if we turn the railroads loose to fight for 5¼ per cent upon their block of capital and that capital inflated by some $7,000,000,000 of water, making their return, as commanded by the law, more than 9 per cent upon their bonded value, and if we turn other corporations loose to fight for 10 per cent, 40 per cent, 100 per cent, sometimes even a thousand per cent, when there is only 4 per cent for distribution among them, and if we give it all to capital, we make our normal state one of economic welfare

Under that condition, of course, a few of the big combinations win and many smaller ones go down to defeat and disaster. The result of all that has been that, according to Senator Pepper, former distinguished Member of the Senate, 92 per cent of American business ultimately fails, and that is in ordinary times, that is average times, and I think before we get out of this depression that percentage will be considerably increased. Other experts have estimated it higher than Senator Pepper did.

Mr. President, there is something wrong about the economic system that results in a thing like that. There is something different now in this present depression from the other depressions, because of the different situation in relation to agriculture toward this depression. Big businesses, fighting and winning these big profits, some of them, have caused this depression, and sentenced us to go down deeper into the depression and to stay longer before we come back to what we call prosperity.

Under that situation I think everything that has been said by the Senator from Wisconsin in support of his amendment, about the adequacy of any measures which will really bring relief and lift us out of this depression, is certainly well supported and well founded.

I find only this defect in the proposition as presented by the Senator from Wisconsin. He has not given that special attention to agriculture which it deserves. Everything he has said for labor and for unemployment is supported entirely and throughout, but agriculture was the first down in this depression. Agriculture is the basic industry of this country, and has been throughout the history of the country, and as long as one-third of the American people are dependent directly upon it, and perhaps 45 per cent of them depend indirectly for their living and property return on it, agriculture must remain the basic industry of this country. There can be no prosperity without a proper consideration of the rights of agriculture.

Therefore, I think that I am going to suggest an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin, if it be adopted, that at least $1,000,000,000 be set aside to handle the agricultural surplus; and as I go along, I think I will be able to show that that will be sufficient for that purpose, and that that will at once restore agricultural prices and restore agricultural buying power and agricultural credit, and furnish the first solid foundation for a return to prosperity. If those things result, they will give a considerable number of unemployed labor, and then the funds suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, if they are used as he suggests, will, I think, employ the rest of the unemployed labor in this country; and until that is done there will be no return of prosperity, and even the calculation of Colonel Ayres will fail unless this relief is given to agriculture, and we will not recover even as speedily as he expects, because of the different situation of agriculture in this depression compared to the other depressions that have gone before it.

Mr. President, there is one other thing necessary, I think, to cure this depression. We have $203,000,000,000 of debts, public and private, in the United States, about $40,000,000,000 public debts, and the other $163,000,000,000 private debts of various kinds, $203,000,000,000 of debts in all. Probably our entire wealth value in the country is not much over $300,000,000,000 at this time. It was $360,000,000,000 in 1928, and I have an idea the depreciation is probably more even than $60,000,000,000.

That means that two-thirds of the national wealth of this country is covered by the debts. I want to ask how those debts can be met under the present gold standard of money value, under the present level of commodity prices, as shown by my chart here. It can not be done and expect the big special-privilege corporations, which are able by their special economic power and by the special favor of laws to protect their profits, not to discharge their men, and we will have a general state of bankruptcy on the present dollar level. It takes about two and a half times as much of agricultural products to pay the debt which the farmers contracted two or three years ago and it takes about twice as much of any other product in the United States to pay such debts.

Therefore, Mr. President, the money standard is out of joint with the price levels of the country, and in order to complete recovery and make it sound with reference to this depression the money standard must be stabilized, as is usually said, or revived, so that the debtor can pay his debts in the same level of prices in which they were contracted, and the dollar which will not do that is not an honest dollar.

Mr. President, it is not my purpose to discuss the money question in detail. It is my purpose to present this general picture of the situation, of the importance of agriculture in it, and then to see what has been promised by the Republican party to give to agriculture the support necessary to end this depression.

I go to the platform, published in the New York Times, and I do not doubt its correctness. The plank is as follows:

> Farm distress in America has its root in the enormous expansion of agricultural production during the war, the deflation of 1919–20, and the dislocation of markets after the war.

Mr. President, I want to take up that statement and show how completely incompetent or ignorant the writers of this platform were. There was, in the first place, no enormous expansion of agricultural production during the war. There was some expansion, but it was not enormous. It was scarcely more than the increase of population.

Next it refers to the deflation of 1919. There was no deflation in 1919. In 1919 there was continued inflation, and in most of 1920 there was continued inflation. The deflation started only late in 1920. The Federal Reserve Board deflation meeting was held on May 18, 1920, but a part of its proceedings were sealed up in secrecy and passed over to the fall of the year, until October.

I desire to present some of the facts to show what this agricultural increase in production was. I think it is important that we have a picture in the RECORD, so that we can reason correctly upon this proposition. Most of the conclusions I find are wild and far afield from the actual facts themselves.

First, I will take wheat. In 1913 the total wheat production in the United States was 763,000,000 bushels. I leave off the odd thousands. In 1914 the total wheat production—and this all occurred before the war began—was 891,000,000 bushels. That is almost 900,000,000 bushels. During the war it increased, in 1915 to 1,025,000,000 bushels. Then it dropped back in 1916 to 636,000,000 bushels, considerably lower than it was before the war began, and in 1917 it was still 636,000,000 bushels. In 1918 it rose to 921,000,000 bushels.

Nobody can say, as the Republican platform said, that that was an enormous expansion of wheat production. On the whole, it was a slight decline, when we figure the two smaller years.

Mr. President, next we will take corn. I am quoting this from the Agricultural Yearbook of 1932. In 1912 the production of corn was 3,124,000,000 bushels. I want that figure in to show that the production of corn was greater in 1912, before the war began, than in any year since. In 1913 it was 2,446,000,000, and in 1914 it was 2,672,000,000.

During the war it rose, in 1915 to 2,994,000,000, still below 1912; in 1916 it was 2,566,000,000, below 1914; in 1917 it was 3,065,000,000, still below 1912; and in 1918 it was 2,502,000,000.

Therefore, Mr. President, the production of the greatest of the agricultural crops, corn, did not, as this Republican platform says, enormously expand. In fact, averaging the whole thing during the war, it declined. Then in 1930 it was reduced down to $2,060,000,000 and in 1931 it increased to $2,556,000,000.

I believe I did not give the wheat figures for 1930 and 1931. To complete the figures I want to give those. Wheat production in 1930 was 858,000,000 bushels and in 1931 it was 892,000,000 bushels.

Mr. President, next I will take cotton. In 1913 the total cotton production was 14,156,000 bales. In 1914 it was 16,135,000 bales. During the war period, in 1915, it was only 11,000,000 bales; in 1917, 11,000,000 bales; and in 1918, only 12,000,000 bales. So instead of cotton enormously increasing during the war it considerably declined in production. To complete that picture, in 1930 the production of cotton was 13,932,000 bales and in 1931 it increased to 16,918,000 bales.

Mr. President, bear in mind that these increases, where they show in any agricultural production, are far less than the increase in population of the United States. There has been at no time, not even during the war, an increase in agricultural production that would keep pace or any more than keep pace with the increase in population of the country.

Now let us take cattle. In 1913 there were 55,833,000 head of cattle on all the farms and in 1914 there were 58,737,000. During the war they increased, in 1915 to 62,000,000, in 1916 to 66,000,000, in 1917 to 69,000,000, and in 1918 to 71,000,000. There was a substantial increase in the number of cattle but not much more there than the increase in population might warrant. In 1930 they dropped back to 59,730,000 and in 1931 to 60,915,000.

Mr. President, I want to emphasize at every step the fallacy of this claim of enormous expansion in agricultural production in the United States either during the war or since the war.

Next, we will take hogs. In 1913 the total number of hogs on the farms was 54,000,000; in 1914, 51,000,000; in 1915, during the war, it increased to 57,000,000; in 1916 to 59,000,000; in 1917 dropped back to 56,000,000; and in 1918 increased to 61,000,000. In 1930 they dropped back to 55,301,000, and in 1931 to 54,374,000, almost back to the 1913 basis.

Mr. President, I have reviewed the principal staple farm products of the country. There are many minor products, of course, but the figures do not run much different from the big staple products. I shall not burden the RECORD by putting in all the details, but these are all of very great importance.

Let us now again read the Republican platform:

> Farm distress in America has its root in enormous expansion of agricultural production during the war, the deflation of 1919–20, and the dislocation of markets after the war.

The first trouble with the makers of the Republican platform is that they had some Wall Streeter making the platform who knew nothing about the agricultural problem. I think I know that his name was Ogden Mills. When he came before the Committee on Banking and Currency, he gave them a picture very much like this platform. I told him then that he ought to go to night school and learn something about the agricultural problem.

Then the platform continues:

There followed, under Republican administration, a long record of legislation in aid of the cooperative organization of farmers and in providing farm credit.

Let me see what that was. The War Finance Corporation was the first institution that appeared for relief of agriculture in our legislation. That corporation was organized and had plenty of money and plenty of resources to have really relieved the agricultural depression. Two billion dollars was provided, but Mr. Eugene Meyer was put in charge of the administration of that institution for the relief of agriculture. He had had 20 years' experience as a gambler on the New York Stock Exchange and that qualified him well for the public service. While he had $2,000,000,000 at his disposal, the most he ever used or ever put out to relieve the $32,000,000,000 depression that hit agriculture in 1920 and 1921 was $187,000,000.

Instead of relieving agriculture he adopted a restrictive policy which actually injured agriculture. He picked out in the West a few of the big ranches and big leaders out there and made loans to them. He bragged that he made some $25,000,000 of loans in my State of Iowa. Of course, $25,000,000 sounds big, but in that State even with starvation prices we produced $600,000,000 each year in agricultural products of all kinds. So it was only a drop in the bucket to meet the situation, and then with his $25,000,000 he skimmed off all of their best securities in the State, and as the loans came due the banks were required to pay them and started us on the road to failure, which followed with so many of our banks.

That was the first of financial aids that came along for the benefit of agriculture. Then the Federal land bank was established. I am quite sure that the general purpose in establishing the Federal land bank was good. The intention was really to help agriculture, but his success in managing the War Finance Corporation qualified the same Eugene Meyer to be placed at the head of the Federal land banks of the United States.

The result has been, although the farmers need some $9,000,000,000 of loans and more than half of this ought to be furnished by the Federal land bank and joint-stock land bank combined, yet only about $1,700,000,000 has been furnished. The same policy of restriction was pursued in that case as in the other. If I had the time and were disposed to do so, I could give details over and over of how they prevented the functioning of the Federal land banks.

For instance, one loan association out in my State that had a record of 11 years on the honor roll, never missing a payment of interest on any loan for one day, let alone having a default or a foreclosure, made 26 applications for new loans. This magnificent body of farmers were jointly liable on all of the loans. Out of the 26 applications they secured only 1 loan. How was that prevented? If a farmer wanted $12,000, word came back that they could only loan him $10,500. The appraisement showed that this value would not warrant the full $12,000. If he wanted $12,000, he could not get along with $10,500; and that sent him to the mortgage company, where he had to pay a higher rate of interest and take a shorter-term loan. The loan associations were angry at the appraisers and figured the appraisers had not given them a square deal. Finally some one sent them out a list of the appraisements, and it showed that every appraisement was all right and that every one of the loans had been cut down in the office over in Omaha. The same Eugene Meyer policy that he has been following in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the matter of loans to the banks of the country was applied there. We can see his earmarks everywhere he appears in the control of financial institutions.

What came next in this economic legislative program for the benefit of the farmer? There was the intermediate credit bank. That is a farmer's reserve bank for shorter loans. That in the hands of Eugene Meyer, with $660,000,000 available, never got above $200,000,000 in functioning or in use in the country, in this country which at starvation prices produces $12,000,000,000 of agricultural products.

The platform continues:

The position of agriculture was gradually improved.

I think if we could find any improvement it would take a tolerably high-powered microscope to measure it.

In 1928 the Republican Party pledged further measures in aid of agriculture, principally tariff protection for agricultural products and the creation of a Federal Farm Board "clothed with the necessary power to promote the establishment of a farm-marketing system of farmer-owned and controlled stabilization corporations."

Almost the first official act of President Hoover was the calling of the special session of Congress to redeem these party pledges. They have been redeemed.

I want to contradict that last statement entirely. Not one of those pledges has been redeemed in any substantial part. Instead of redeeming the pledges, they have hit agriculture and driven it deeper and deeper into depression every year as the years roll by.

The platform continues:

The 1930 tariff act increased the rates on agricultural products by 30 per cent, upon industrial products only 12 per cent. That act equalized, so far as legislation can do so, the protection afforded the farmer with the protection afforded industry and presented a vast flood of cheap wool, grain, livestock, dairy, and other products from entering the American market.

Mr. President, an honest platform could not have stopped with any such statement as that. If they had wanted the platform honestly to let the farmers know what the tariff had done for them, it would have said, "Yes; we increased your rates, but not one of those increases is effective on any of your exportable surplus. Not one of them has protected the price of the big staple farm products."

Let us take wheat. They mention grain as being protected by these rates. Here was the situation as to grain in 1929. Wheat that year sold 15 to 20 cents a bushel higher at Winnipeg than it did at Minneapolis. I know a man at Humboldt, Iowa, cashier of the national bank there, who has a farm at Portal, N. Dak. Portal is on the Canadian line. In 1928 when he harvested his wheat crop he hauled it across the street and sold it in North Portal, which is in Canada. At that time he paid 12 cents a bushel tariff duty, but since then Canada has raised her tariff rate to 42 cents in order to be neighborly and to match our rate. He also paid a dollar a load entrance fee; and after paying that and paying the tariff duty he had left 9 cents per bushel more than he was offered for the same wheat on the same day on his own side of the street. That is what happened to the wheat crop in 1929.

Then some time in 1930 the Farm Board began its operations. They make the claim, Mr. President, that they raised the price of wheat in the United States about 15 cents a bushel above the world price level. Perhaps that is true as the world price level stands, but the Farm Board had another policy that perhaps did the world price more damage than it did the domestic price good. It bought up a considerable surplus, bought it just like a gambler; it did not buy it to hold it for a cost-of-production price or anything of that kind, nor at a cost-of-production price; but it went into the board of trade and bought wheat as any other speculator or gambler would buy it, and then held that surplus constantly as a menace over the world market.

The bidder in the world market did not know but that on the next day that wheat would be dumped into the world market, and every time he undertook a purchase he pointed his finger at the American surplus and beat the world market down. So, Mr. President, it is probable, I think, though there can be no exact determination of that question, that this policy of the Farm Board first reduced the world market as much as or more than it increased the domestic market. Therefore, altogether, the operation of the tariff law and of the Farm Board has been to the detriment of agriculture and not to its advantage.

Then, again, the recent Republican platform says:

By the agricultural marketing act the Federal Farm Board was created and armed with broad powers and ample funds.

"Ample funds!" Mr. President, if the preamble in that act only used the words and the terms that have been quoted in this platform, the funds might have been more nearly ample, but the platform makers have deleted reference to the most important item in the whole farm marketing act—the exportable surplus. The surplus is not mentioned; it is deleted and cut out here in some three different places. So it is apparent that the Republican platform has abandoned the main purpose of the farm marketing act which was to control the exportable surplus.

The sum of $500,000,000 was given the Farm Board. The exportable surplus, one of the things mentioned three different times in the preamble of the act, amounts to about eighteen hundred or two thousand million dollars in the form in which it is exported. It will probably amount to about twelve hundred million dollars as it leaves the farm; and, Mr. President, $500,000,000 is not an "ample fund" to handle an exportable surplus such as that. Perhaps we shall hear more of that proposition as we go along.

Now, here is a part of the preamble quoted by this magical platform:

To promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, so that—agriculture will be placed on the basis of economic equality with other industries.

Then comes a deletion—

And then comes another deletion—

by encouraging the organization of producers into effective association for their own control, * * * and by promoting the establishment of a farm-marketing system of producer-owned and producer-controlled cooperative associations.

Mr. President, I have here a copy of the farm marketing act, and in its preamble the surplus is mentioned three times. I quote from the preamble of the act:

(4) By aiding in preventing and controlling surpluses in any agricultural commodity, through orderly production and distribution, so as to maintain advantageous domestic markets and prevent such surpluses from causing undue and excessive fluctuations or depressions in prices for the commodity.

Then—

(b) There shall be considered as a surplus for the purposes of this act any seasonal or year's total surplus, produced in the United States and either local or national in extent, that is in excess of the requirements for the orderly distribution of the agricultural commodity or is in excess of the domestic requirements for such commodity.

Mr. President, the one great purpose of the marketing act was the control of the exportable surplus. Yet in the Republican platform reference to the exportable surplus was entirely deleted. There can be no relief for agriculture unless the exportable surplus is controlled.

How can it be controlled? The platform of 1928 said that there should be set up a proper organization with authority and funds to control the surplus. Who is it who taught us how to handle the surplus? Well, Mr. President, we learned about it from Herbert Hoover. In 1917 he first told us how to handle the exportable surplus and how to do it successfully.

On the 17th day of July, 1917, he wrote a letter to President Wilson in which he said:

JULY 10, 1917.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: In response to your request I send you herewith the following notes compiled by myself and my associates upon the present situation with regard to wheat.

1. The 1917 harvest promises to yield 678,000,000 bushels. The normal internal consumption and seed requirement (assuming a carry-over of same volume in 1918 as in 1917), amounts to about 600,000,000 bushels; thus leaving a theoretical export balance of 78,000,000 bushels. The conservation measures are already having a marked effect and it is not too much to hope that the national saving may be 80,000,000 to 100,000,000 bushels, and therefore the export balance increased to, say 158,000,000 to 180,000,000 bushels.

2. The experience this year in the rampant speculation, extortionate profits, and the prospect of even narrower supplies than 1917 harvest and carry-over, must cause the deepest anxiety. No better proof of the hardship worked upon our people during the past year needs be deducted than the recitation of the fact that the producer received an average of $1.51 per bushel for the 1916 wheat harvest, yet wheat has been as high as $3.25 at Chicago and the price of flour has been from time to time based upon this speculative price of wheat, so that through one evil cause or another, the consumer has suffered from 50 to 100 per cent, and the producer gained nothing.

After much study and investigation, it is evident that this unbearable increase in margin between producer and consumer is due not only to rank speculation, but more largely than this to the wide margin of profit naturally demanded by every link in the chain to insure them from the great hazards of trade in the widely fluctuating and dangerous price situation during the year when all normal stabilization has been lost through the interruption of world trade and war. All these factors render it vitally necessary to initiate systematic measures which will absolutely eliminate all possibility of speculation, cure extortionate profits, effect proper distribution and restriction on exports to a point within our own protection. These measures can not be accomplished by punitive prosecution of evildoers, but only by proper and anticipatory organization and regulation all along the distribution chain.

3. During recent months the allied governments have consolidated their buying into one hand in order that they might relieve the burden of speculation from their own consumers, and the export price, if not controlled, is subject to the will of the allied buyer, and in a great measure the American producer is left to his judgment and without voice. Furthermore, in normal circumstances United States and Canadian wheat is moved to Europe largely in the fall months, such shipments averaging about 40,000,000 bushels per month and relieving a corresponding flow from the farms into the interior terminals. This year, owing to the shortage of shipping, the allied supplies must proceed over a large period of the year and will not during the fall months apparently average over 20,000,000 to 25,000,000 bushels per month. We must therefore, expect a glut in our interior terminals during a considerable period. The financial resources of the grain trade are probably insufficient to carry this extra load without the help of speculators, and, moreover, the consolidation of practically all foreign buying in the hands of the allied buyer has further tended to diminish the capital resources available by placing a number of firms out of business and limits the financial capital available in export trade. The net result of this situation is that unless some strong and efficient Government action is immediately settled and brought into play the American producer will face a slump in wheat. In any event, the price of export wheat will be dictated by a single agency. The American consumer will be faced with a large part of the essential breadstuff having passed into the hands of speculators, for some one must buy and hold not only the normal flow from the farmer but this probable glut.

4. With great reduction in the consumption of wheat bread now fortunately in progress, the employment of our mills must be greatly diminished, and with the reduction of domestic-flour production our daily feed from wheat residues will be greatly curtailed. Therefore we must induce foreign buyers to accept flour instead of wheat.

5. In order to do justice to the producers, who have shown great patriotism in a special effort to increase production in 1917 and to further stimulate the efforts of 1918, it is absolutely vital that we shall protect the farmer from slump in price this year due to glut as above or from the uncontrolled decisions of any one buyer. I am informed that most of the allied countries have fixed the price of wheat to the farmer at $1.80 per bushel, and many of them believe that as Allies it is our duty to furnish wheat at a price which, delivered to them, will not exceed their domestic price—in other words, about $1.50 per bushel Chicago. Neither the responsible officials nor I hold this view, because I consider the stimulation to production, if no other reason, is in the long run in the interest of the Allies. There is, however, a limit to price which so trespasses upon the rights of the consumer as to defeat its own object through strikes, raises in wages, and social disturbances in the country. It is with the view to finding a solution to those problems, filled with the greatest dangers to both our producers and consumers, that legislation has been proposed and pressed for speedy enactment.

I should like to see some legislation proposed and speedily enacted now like this was in 1917.

6. The proposed Food Administration has conferred with many hundred patriotic men engaged in production and distribution and has investigated the condition of the consumers in many centers as well. Many plans have been tentatively put forward and abandoned and others have been developed, but in any case none has nor can be settled until legislation has been completed. Three facts stand out plainly enough from our investigations: First, that in this situation the farmer will need protection as to the price of wheat; second, that large masses of people in the consuming centers are being actually undernourished to-day due to the exorbitant cost of living, and these conditions, unless some remedy be found, are likely to repeat themselves in even more vicious forms at this time next year; and third, the speculator, legitimate or vicious, has taken a large part of the money now being paid by the consumer.

Mr. President, that describes the exact situation at the present time; and the present time is a good deal worse than that time was—much worse for agriculture—and the emergency so far as agriculture is concerned is much deeper.

Now, Mr. President, I will read only one more sentence, and then ask that the rest of this letter be inserted in the RECORD:

Or the Government must buy the surplus wheat at some reasonable minimum price, allowing the normal domestic trade of the country to proceed with proper safeguards against speculation.

It was in that way, Mr. President, away back in 1917, that Mr. Hoover laid down for us the proper method of handling an exportable surplus in the interest of the farmers of the United States and for the protection of the consumers in the United States as well.

I ask to have the remainder of this letter inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

7. It seems to be overlooked in some quarters that the marketing of this year's wheat is surrounded with circumstances new to history and that the old distributing safeguards are torn away by isolation from the reciprocal markets abroad and the extinction of a free export market and free export transportation. The harvest has begun to move, and from these very causes the price of wheat has begun to drop, and if the farmer is to sell his wheat, either the speculator must return to the market to buy and carry not only the normal flow from the farmer in excess of domestic and foreign requirements but also the glut due to the restriction upon the outlet to the latter, and he must charge his toll to the producer and the consumer, and this latter upon a more extensive scale than last year, as his risks will be greater and the practical export buyer must fix his own price for export wheat from the sole outlook of his own clients, and in execution of his duty he will in all normal circumstances follow the market down by buying only his time-to-time requirements, as he can not be expected to carry the load of our domestic accumulation. Or the governments must buy the surplus wheat at some reasonable minimum price, allowing the normal domestic trade of the country to proceed with proper safeguards against speculation. Nor would the services of the speculator be necessary, for the Government should be able to stabilize the price of wheat without his assistance and can control the price of export wheat.

I remain, your obedient servant,

HERBERT HOOVER.

His Excellency the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.
Washington, D. C.

Mr. BROOKHART. Following this letter the law was passed on the 10th of August, 1917. Then a board was appointed to fix the price of wheat; and I ask that the report of that board be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

STATEMENT OF FARM REPRESENTATIVES WHO WERE MEMBERS OF THE PRESIDENT'S FAIR PRICE COMMISSION FOR WHEAT, 1917 CROP

(a) The allied committee which purchased wheat for all the Allies was practically the only export buyer of wheat, and through this buying power over the surplus exercised an important influence on the price of American wheat.

(b) The minutes of the committee's deliberations, August 17–30, 1917, a certified copy of which was delivered to each member before the final adjournment, evidence the care taken by the committee to prevent outside interference. After many formal and informal ballots it was voted unanimously to recommend to the President that the price for No. 1 northern spring wheat be fixed at $2.20. Only members of the committee were admitted after balloting began; all were present except Mr. Rhett, and none left the room until a statement addressed to the President had been prepared and approved by the committee. The conclusions of the committee were not made known to Mr. Hoover until after this statement had been approved.

(c) In reaching its conclusions the committee kept constantly in mind the three following factors, as stated in its report to the President: The fact that the United States was at war, the need of encouraging the producer, and the necessity of preventing speculation and profiteering.

(d) In accepting the recommendations of the fair-price committee the President issued a statement August 30, 1917, in the course of which he said: "The price now recommended by that committee, $2.20 per bushel at Chicago for the basic grade, will be rigidly adhered to by the Food Administration. Mr. Hoover, at his expressed wish, has taken no part in the deliberations of the committee on whose recommendation I determined the Government's fair price, nor has he in any way intimated an opinion regarding that price."

CHARLES BARRETT.
L. J. TABER.
E. D. FUNK.
W. J. SHORTHILL.

Mr. BROOKHART. Then, Mr. President, the board fixed this price at $2.20 a bushel, or 70 cents higher than the foreign bid; the Wheat Corporation immediately bid that price, and the price went to that level.

Mr. President, some farmers have erroneously, I am sure, charged the Wheat Corporation and Mr. Hoover with beating down the price of wheat instead of raising it up. I want to review that portion of the quotation of wheat prices, to show just exactly what did happen.

Beginning in July, when Mr. Hoover wrote this letter, the price of wheat was $2.66 a bushel. In August it averaged down to $2.47 a bushel. Because at that time those prices were at that figure, many of the farmers of the country believed that when the Wheat Corporation fixed the price of $2.20 they were cutting down the price of wheat, because they did not know of this $1.50 bid that had been arranged by the foreign countries—England, France, and Italy—and they were all the bidders we had.

On August 17, 1917, cash wheat was $2.40 a bushel; but on the same date September futures were only $2 a bushel. So already the future market was responding to this $1.50 bid, and wheat was rapidly dropping down to that level. On the 30th of August, however, the price was fixed at $2.20 a bushel, and December futures immediately rose to $2.17. I am quoting Minneapolis prices, which would be 3 cents less than the Chicago price. That meant that the prices were rising 17 cents a bushel above the September futures price that had been established before that time. So that this action, instead of reducing the price of wheat, did protect it against the foreign bid that was coming along surely to depress the price to $1.50 a bushel.

The Wheat Corporation had $150,000,000 to buy that wheat. It had authority to borrow more if it needed it, and it needed $385,000,000 more. It borrowed that much, and with $150,000,000 bought and held $535,000,000 worth of wheat. Then 1918 came along and the slogan went out, "Bread will win the war." The President called upon the farmers to raise more wheat, and issued a proclamation promising them the same price for the 1919 wheat crop that they had received for the 1918 crop. The 1918 crop had gone to $2.26. Six cents a bushel went on in an increase of railroad rates; and that was put on for the railroads and not for the farmers.

Under that stimulation the farmers sowed 18,000,000 acres more wheat; and then the armistice was signed on the 11th of November, and the war was over, and then we might not need this big surplus of wheat. This created a new situation; and the best of all the lessons in the control of surpluses has come out of this situation.

Mr. Julius H. Barnes was assisted in the management of the Wheat Corporation at that time; and on February 5, 1919, Mr. Barnes made a statement before the House Agricultural Committee, then considering legislation necessary to make the 1919 wheat price guaranty effective.

I now ask to have inserted in the RECORD the balance of Mr. Barnes's statement, found on page 152 of this book entitled, "The Grain Trade During the World War," by Frank M. Surface, economist for the United States Grain Corporation; also his statement in the first two paragraphs of page 153.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The matter referred to is as follows:

On February 5, 1919, Mr. Barnes made a statement before the House Agricultural Committee, then considering the legislation necessary to make the 1919 wheat price guaranty effective. Mr. Barnes stated that the men then in charge of the Grain Corporation and serving as volunteers wished to retire at the end of the 1918–19 crop year, but they felt that they should put the benefit of their experience at the service of the committee. Mr. Barnes also disclaimed any desire on the part of either Mr. Hoover or the Grain Corporation officials to urge any particular form of legislation, but from their two years of service in this field they did feel that certain general powers must be delegated to the President if the guaranty was to be administered successfully. He recommended that the following provisions should be made in the legislation:

(a) An appropriation of at least $1,000,000,000 so that there might be complete confidence in the ability of the Government to carry through its undertaking.

(b) Authority to borrow, if necessary, in the regular commercial manner, pledging the credit and property of the agency.

(c) Authority to buy and sell wheat and other cereals and their products and other foodstuffs at home or abroad, for cash or for credit.

(d) Import and export embargo power.

(e) Authority to build storage facilities or contract construction with private enterprise together with authority to requisition storage and prescribe terms of payment.

(f) Authority to license dealers, millers, and elevators.

(g) Authority to control exchange trading.

(h) Authority to transport at home or abroad and carry on business anywhere in the world, and to form or use any corporations or agencies necessary.

(i) Preferential rail service on American railroads and steamships and authority to control the transport flow of all cereals or products into any markets or seaports.

In support of the necessity for these provisions, Mr. Barnes discussed in some detail the difficulties which might be encountered in handling an exceptionally large crop as was then promised in the face of the changed world conditions. However, to this statement he added:

"Much of the current discussion apparently assumes that there is no question but that the 1919 crop will greatly exceed the requirements of the world for ready consumption, and one must necessarily recognize that that is actually the present prospect, but prospects sometimes deteriorate before their actual fulfillment, and no policy should be based irretrievably on prospects only.

"I am forced to the conclusion that the only wise legislation possible at present is such extensive preparation that it will meet any possible crop development or combination of influences creating the most unfavorable conditions."

Mr. BROOKHART. Under this request, Mr. Barnes, chairman of the executive committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, the super-government of the United States, prosperity adviser of the President of the United States, comes in and asks for a thousand million dollars for wheat alone; and yet this Republican platform says that the Farm Board was given ample funds for this agricultural problem, which included cotton and wheat and corn and oats and livestock and rice and several other agricultural products. But Mr. Barnes and Mr. Hoover asked for a thousand million dollars for wheat alone, and they got it; and fearing that even that would not be enough to handle the big prospective surplus that was then coming on, with 18,000,000 acres of extra sowing, they asked authority to borrow more money if they needed it, and got that authority, and they got these other authorizations.

Export and import embargo power; authority to buy foodstuffs for cash or for credit; to buy them anywhere in the world; authority to license dealers, millers, and elevators; to control exchange trading; to establish agencies anywhere in the world. They also got authority to condemn the terminal elevators, so that they might hold this surplus wheat as long as they chose, in order to give the farmers their cost-of-production price for these products.

In those days President Hoover and his assistant, Mr. Barnes, were talking like the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] talked about the relief of the unemployed here to-day. Why have they gone clear away from that proposition? Why have they abandoned their position, and why did they write a platform like this in the Republican National Convention? Why are not that letter and the principles announced in that letter of Mr. Hoover, which was printed in the Republican campaign textbook of four years ago, inserted in the Republican platform, instead of this inadequate platitude that means nothing and can do nothing for the relief of agriculture?

Now, Mr. President, we will see what else is in this magical, ragical, tragical, agricultural platform.

The Federal Farm Board, created by the agricultural marketing act, has been compelled to conduct its operations during a period in which all commodity prices, industrial as well as agricultural, have fallen to disastrous levels. A period of decreasing demand and of national calamities, such as drought and flood, has intensified the problem of agriculture.

Mr. President, the students of agriculture from Wall Street who wrote this platform did not know enough to know that drought would reduce agricultural production, and that outside of the drought section it would help agriculture throughout the rest of the country, would reduce the supply instead of increasing it; so they write that inconsistency right here in the platform itself!

Then they say it was "during a period in which all commodity prices, industrial as well as agricultural, have fallen to disastrous levels."

Why do they not say that agricultural prices fell about twice as much, and since 1929 at that, as did the prices of the other products in the United States, according to the chart figures which I gave a while ago?

This platform is unfair all the way through. It fails to state the facts. It fails to state the real truth about the agricultural condition anywhere.

Says this platform:

Nevertheless, after only a little more than two years' efforts, the Federal Farm Board has many achievements of merit to its credit.

I remember some of those achievements. It got a man named Milnor at the head of two wheat corporations. It established two. One of those is called the stabilizing and the other the marketing corporation. The biggest achievement, in reference to wheat, was to employ Milnor at $50,000 a year. That is the most important thing in his employment. He testified himself that he operated in this way: He would go into the board of trade selling wheat in his marketing corporation, then on the same day go into the same board of trade buying wheat in his stabilizing corporation, perhaps the next day he was doing the opposite, a scheme of wash sales just as reprehensible as the wash sales of the stock exchange we have been investigating recently. That is one of the achievements of the Farm Board. Mr. Milnor was not the only high-salaried man. There were some at forty and thirty-five thousand in various positions, something in the way of big salaries for cooperation unknown throughout the world, and the cooperatives of many of the countries are a great deal larger than this.

Another achievement of the Farm Board was to get a man named Creekmore to handle cotton at $75,000 a year, and he had some 300,000 members in his cooperative association and he himself testified that their income would average less than $300 a year.

Let us see what other achievements the Farm Board has.

It has increased the membership of the cooperative farm marketing association to coordinate efforts of the local associations.

What good does that do if it constantly beats down the prices of farm products? That is not the kind of cooperation farmers are looking for.

By cooperation with other Federal agencies it has made available to farm marketing associations a large value of credit, which in the emergency would not otherwise have been available.

Mr. President, it is not more credit the farmers want; they want prices so they can pay the money they now owe.

Larger quantities of farm products have been handled cooperatively than ever before in the history of the cooperative movement.

What advantage is it to handle them cooperatively if the price goes down all the time? Unless this cooperative handling is going to increase the price it is a failure, and it will be a failure as long as the surplus is not properly handled. The surplus is the thing that depresses the price, and any cooperative organization with a surplus still left unhandled will result all the time in failure of this same kind.

Grain crops have been sold by the farmer through his association directly upon the world markets.

But they have been sold just the same as any other products, and they were not held back as they were by Hoover and Barnes in 1917, 1918, and 1919. They were sold in a way to depress the world market, dumped, as it were, into the world market, and I have no doubt they did depress the world market as much as or more than the Farm Board ever benefited the domestic market.

Due to the 1930 tariff act and the agricultural marketing act it can truthfully be stated that the prices received by the American farmer for his wheat, corn, rye, barley, oats, flaxseed, cattle, butter, and many other products, cruelly low though they are, are higher than the prices received by the farmers of any competing nation for the same products.

Mr. President, I do not know exactly what they mean by competing nations, but I did look up something about some farm prices in some other nations, and I got the quotations from France and from Germany. In Minneapolis No. 1 northern wheat was quoted on May 6, 1932, at 68.9 cents. In Paris it was quoted at $1.80 and in Berlin at $1.78. I got this other quotation, of hogs, in Berlin, quoted at $7.80 and in Chicago at $4.02.

So the writers of this Republican platform again seem to be out to deceive the farmers and the country rather than to tell the truth about this agricultural situation.

The Republican Party has also aided the American farmer by relief of the sufferers in the drought-stricken areas, through loans for rehabilitation and through road building to provide employment, by the development of the inland waterways system, by the perishable product act, by the strengthening of the extension system, and by the appropriation of $125,000,000 to recapitalize the Federal land banks and enable them to extend time to worthy borrowers.

As I remember it, Mr. President, not one of those was a partisan measure. Every one of them passed by nonpartisan votes, and, as I remember, the flood-control measure was sponsored mainly by Senator Ransdell, of Louisiana, a Democrat.

This plank of the platform concludes:

The Republican Party pledges itself to the principle of assistance to cooperative marketing associations, owned and controlled by the farmers themselves, through the provisions of the agricultural marketing act, which will be promptly amended or modified, as experience shows to be necessary, to accomplish the objects set forth in the preamble of that act.

Mr. President, I have finished the reading of the most remarkable platform ever written in the history of the country under conditions like these. The one big problem of agriculture, the one thing that would take agriculture out of depression and then follow by taking other business out of depression because of agricultural prosperity, is not mentioned in the Republican platform, and that is the control of the agricultural surplus. In no place is there one word about it, and three times they deleted quotations from the marketing act in order to avoid mention of the control of the surplus.

Mr. President, all of the great farm organizations of the country have singled out the control of the surplus at a cost-of-production price as the principal item in agricultural relief, and this convention, called Republican, but which ought to be relabeled "Wall Street," has ignored the demands of the great farm organizations and the farmers throughout the country and has adopted a platform which means nothing and which can give nothing in the way of agricultural relief.

So, Mr. President, by this platform agriculture, along with the rest of the country, is sentenced to go down deeper into depression and to stay longer before it can return to prosperity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] to the amendment of the committee. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment proposed by Mr. LA FOLLETTE to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 114, line 6, after the word "appropriated," add the following:

That Title V of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, is amended by adding at the end thereof, the following:

"SEC. 509. The amount of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates heretofore issued is hereby fixed as the value of such certificates as of July 1, 1932, and interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed on said certificates from July 1, 1932. The rate of interest on the loans heretofore made on such certificates shall from the date of such loans be reduced to a rate of 2 per cent per annum and adjusted accordingly.

"That the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, upon the application of a veteran holding a certificate (with or without the consent of the beneficiary thereof), is authorized and directed to make a payment or payments of a total of as much as 75 per cent of the face value of his certificate, from which shall be deducted all loans or charges against such certificate. A veteran may make application for the cash payment herein authorized any time prior to July 1, 1934. In case physical or mental incapacity or the death of the veteran prevents the making or filing of a personal application, then it may be made by the beneficiary or the representative of the veteran, or the executor or administrator of his estate and in such manner as may be by regulations prescribed. In case of the death of the veteran, after an application has been made, but prior to the payment being made to him, the payment shall then be made to the beneficiary or his estate, whichever may be entitled to the same.

"SEC. 510. The Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in the exercise of his powers to make regulations for payment under section 509 shall, to the fullest extent practicable, provide a method by which veterans may present their applications and receive payment in close proximity to the places of their residence."

SEC. 2. The payments authorized on adjusted-service certificates under sections 509 and 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3 per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act.

In the event that the purchasing power of the dollar in the wholesale commodity markets, as ascertained by the United States Department of Labor, shall at any time fall as much as 2 per cent below the average value of the year 1926, the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as may from time to time be necessary to restore the purchasing power of the dollar to the normal standard of 1926.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for the notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

Mr. TRAMMELL obtained the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senator from Illinois desires to offer an amendment, but it would not be in order, as I understand it, at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not when the amendment of the Senator from Florida is pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida to the amendment of the committee. The Senator from Florida is recognized.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief explanation of the amendment which I have proposed. In offering the amendment I am actuated by the fact that I feel that in providing relief for the purpose of trying to assist in alleviating distress and unemployment throughout the country, such aid as may be afforded to our ex-service men will be as far-reaching and as universal in its distribution and as broad in the relief it affords as any action which may be taken on the part of Congress in the matter of trying to contribute some assistance toward dispelling the depression which prevails throughout the country.

The amendment provides that an ex-service man who has obtained a loan of 50 per cent on his certificate may receive an additional amount of 25 per cent, not as a loan but a payment, making a total of 75 per cent of the face value of the certificate. On the other hand, the veteran who has not obtained any loan whatever on his certificate under the provisions of the law which permitted him to do so in the past may obtain a payment of 75 per cent of the face value of the certificate. I have prepared the amendment in this way so that those who have not heretofore obtained loans would have the privilege of securing as payment the same percentage of the face value of their certificates as those who have exercised the privilege given them under existing law passed some time ago to obtain loans of 50 per cent.

The amendment provides that the face value of the certificate shall be fixed as the value on July 1, 1932, and therefore suspends the law under which the certificates were issued providing for the certificate to reach its ultimate complete face value only in 1945. This makes the value of the certificate, now and hereafter, the full face value. But for this proposal the face value would not be reached until 1945.

I take this position regarding the face value of the certificate because I feel that the basis upon which Congress enacted the adjusted compensation law some years ago was that a soldier was to receive as compensation $1 per day for services in the United States in addition to his regular pay and $1.25 per day for the time he spent in overseas service. In that law it was provided that we—the Government—should take until 1945 to pay him the full face value of his certificate. Many of us felt at the time of the enactment of the law on this subject that the veterans should be allowed a cash-adjusted compensation. I think it is a great pity that that was not done when we dealt with the subject in 1924, because at that time the Nation was amply able financially to make proper adjustment in the nature of cash compensation. I was among those who favored the cash-adjustment policy when we were dealing with the subject in 1924, and I had previously introduced at least one or two bills so providing. However, that is water that has passed the mill and we are now confronted with the situation as we find it under existing law. I think that in justice and right and in appreciation of the great and patriotic services these men have rendered to the country, we may well provide that the face value of the certificates shall be as of July 1, 1932, instead of waiting until 1945.

The amendment provides that the payment shall be made upon the basis I have outlined. It provides that certain amounts of the adjusted-compensation certificates which are not absorbed under this payment and the loans previously permitted shall draw 2 per cent interest hereafter.

That I feel is a just provision, and I have proposed it in the hope that it might encourage those who have heretofore allowed their money to remain in the fund would continue to allow it to remain there. Another provision is that the rate of interest on loans heretofore made shall be reduced from 4 per cent to 2 per cent from the date the veteran obtained the loan up to the present time.

These are the main features of the amendment which I have proposed for settling the present face value as the value of the adjusted-compensation certificates and for making cash payments thereon. I know that in dealing with a relief plan a great many have felt that most of the relief should be given to financial institutions and public corporations. I disagree with such policy. There has not been very much proposed to assist even the governmental agencies of the States or of the municipalities, but the whole relief plan heretofore has seemed to center around the idea of having the funds go to the financial institutions of the country and to large corporations like the railroads. That plan up to the present date has practically failed except in that it has probably prevented a danger that was impending some months ago, which, of course, I think, has justified the legislation. If by enacting relief plans we have prevented a great disaster in the nature of many failures of our financial institutions, then we were justified in the legislation we have heretofore enacted which is now operating through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. I hear a good many people criticizing, and it is becoming quite popular to criticize almost any action of Congress. I hear them criticizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and its operations.

Some say that Congress gave all the money to the banks. I have never held any brief for the bankers, but I believe in being fair with the banks; and, while I have supported legislation which has been of some assistance to them, I have not been thinking particularly about the banks or their officials. I have been thinking about the depositors in the banks, the people of the country who do business with the banks. I know of nothing that is more disastrous to a community than to have a bank failure or a number of bank failures or to have a great number of them throughout a State or a particular locality within a State. I do not mean disastrous particularly to the heads of the banks, but disastrous to the every-day citizen, to the small business concerns, to the thousands, who when bank failures become widespread, as they did a while back in this country, and to the millions of depositors, many of whom had all their accumulation of funds swept away within a night by bank failures.

So I have felt that Congress has been justified in the enactment of laws and provisions which would try to steady our financial institutions. The vision, however, should have been broader. Sometimes, in thinking of the situation, I fear that those in power have not had an extended and wide view of conditions in the country and great need for relief. We find one group that thinks only about assistance for their group only.

So when I hear people say that if Congress would finish its work, adjourn, and go home, the condition of the country would be better, I sometimes think that those who are so generous in heralding such admonition as that are those who think they have obtained all they wish from Congress and they want Congress to adjourn so that others seeking relief may not have any aid extended to them. We have heard sentiments of that kind expressed to-day. "Let Congress hasten along, expedite matters—pass a lot of half-baked legislation—and adjourn, and the country will then take care of itself." That is what we heard a little over a year ago.

I remember all the newspapers of the country a year and a half ago saying, "Well, if Congress will only adjourn, the stock market will revive, business will improve, and soon we shall have a prosperous era throughout the country, everybody will be happy and contented." Well, under a constitutional limitation which provided that the session should end at a certain time Congress was adjourned, but nobody has heard anything much except depression and distress and catastrophe after catastrophe in the industrial life of the Nation and in the everyday life of the people ever since the Congress adjourned March a year ago, and we know now that it was all a rainbow hope.

I believe that we should remain in session until we may outline a comprehensive plan to take care of the entire situation, the very best plan that can be devised by those in position of authority and responsibility whose duty it is to lend their best efforts to America in this day of her travail.

I read in the Washington Herald to-day a very interesting article in regard to how Canada had handled relief during the depression. For a year and a half or two years in this country the only pretense or gesture toward trying to bring about relief was in the way of appointing commissions or boards or saying, forsooth, after a while we shall endeavor to discover some method of bringing relief. How different was the situation in Canada! In 1930 the Premier of that country, through a special committee of Parliament, undertook to formulate plans for meeting the situation and the disaster in its very inception. As I read that article to-day I thought what a tragedy could have been prevented in our own country had as much vision and as much foresight and as much devotion for the public weal been manifested as has been by the people of the little nation of 10,000,000 to the north, who, as a result of the action of their Government, have not had such a terrible time as we have experienced.

I think that one great trouble with us is that everybody wants everything done in just his way, and that almost all of us have a contracted vision; it is not as broad as it should be. I feel that a majority of Congress, at least, and the administration have had very contracted and restricted ideas as to how relief should be extended, and there has been no effort made to bring about relief for all our people. I believe if we would make an adjustment with the ex-service men in this country and provide a fund of a billion and two hundred million or a billion and three hundred million dollars to go directly into their hands, to be expended in their respective localities, which are as wide as the Nation, that such action could not fail to be of substantial assistance not only to the veteran but as well in helping to support our business institutions and in helping to relieve unemployment and distress.

I do not think that is any matter of favoritism to make the cash payment to the veterans. I hear some talk about favoritism; it is said, "Why deal with this one class of people?" I have not yet seen a piece of legislation suggested in this body or in the other House of Congress or by the White House that was not to a more restricted group than legislation which would assist over 4,000,000 of our ex-service men and their families and those dependent upon them and the communities in which they reside.

I think everybody realizes that something has to be done. Considering the legislation that is pending now, Mr. President, how many people do you suppose will receive employment under it? It is a relief measure designed to give employment to those who are now out of work. I have not heard anyone state just how many it will help to obtain work; I dare say that it will be of assistance; necessarily it will assist; but it will not anything like take care of the unemployment situation throughout the country. I am heartily in favor of this legislation to give relief to the unemployed, but it will not reach nearly so many people as we can reach through making a cash adjustment—not the entire payment in cash at present—to the ex-service men of the country. However, I believe in even going to the extent of a full cash payment.

Some may call such a measure class legislation; but if we enact legislation that will not afford employment to more than 1,000,000 people, when there are 10,000,000 people out of employment, is not that class legislation in the direct benefit it provides? It is class legislation in the sense that it only assists a comparatively limited number when there will be millions of people who know that they will get no benefit from it. So, at best, the enactment of the pending bill will not assist as many as would be assisted if we should make an adjusted cash settlement—not paying the entire amount—with the ex-service men of our country.

I read in a newspaper this afternoon a story to the effect that some of the leaders of the so-called bonus army wanted all or none. Well, if there are a few of the leaders who feel that way about it they do not have to take the cash, but can leave it in the Treasury. I have not offered this amendment on account of the presence of the bonus army that is here in Washington. They have every right to petition the Congress. No one has any objection to that whatever, and I feel that they are to be commended for their behavior. So far as I have heard, their behavior, generally speaking, has been very commendable. The few of them whom I know personally are fine men with only the best of purposes. This little group here represents only about one-half of 1 per cent of the ex-service men of this country. I know that the 99½ per cent of the veterans of this country who are back home struggling to make a living and to care for their families are just as patriotic as the one-half of 1 per cent who have come to Washington in an effort to force Congress to take action only as they wish it. Those back home and also 95 per cent of those in Washington will appreciate being permitted to receive as a payment such amount as would be allowed to them under the amendment which I have proposed. I know the ex-service men in my State quite well, and I know that in times of stress such as we have at present they will appreciate receiving up to 75 per cent of the face value of their certificates.

I know that they also appreciate the fact that the Nation is in a distressed condition with a total of 10,000,000 unemployed, and that there are many others for whom there should be some relief. This general unemployment situation should be cared for; and instead of their saying "We must have 100 per cent, or we will not take anything," as the leaders of the bonus army here are quoted as saying, I dare say that the 99½ per cent of the ex-service men of my State, who are back at home and not here en masse telling Congress in substance that they must do so and so, appreciate the situation.

I have proposed this amendment as a tribute to and a recognition of the service of all patriotic service men to their country, because I think it is just and right, and also for the reason that I know of no way in which we can make a greater contribution toward the relief of suffering, hardship, and unemployment throughout the different localities. This will give us a general expenditure of a large sum of money that will go to the countryside and into every hamlet and village of each of the States throughout the Union.

If we are not going to do this, if we are going to deny this assistance to our ex-service men, what are we going to do? Are we going just to provide funds, as contemplated by this bill, to loan to somebody to go and arrange with some contractor to carry on some private enterprise out of which he will make money? It is true he will give somebody employment, and, of course, the object and purpose of the legislation is to try to stimulate employment, to stimulate building activity.

If we do that, however, are we going to say that the door is closed to this other avenue and this other course which we may pursue toward trying to assist those who are out of employment, many of whom are in destitute circumstances, many of whom have as good security upon which to obtain funds from the Federal Government as the banks and the private corporations and even the municipal corporations to which we propose to loan money under the other provisions of this bill?

The security of these men is their adjusted-service compensation certificates—an honest debt owed to them by the Nation. It is true that it is not due yet under the formal terms of the certificate, but they have that as an asset. They have that as a recognition of their service on the part of the Nation. I propose to give that certificate a cash value. Now, in the hour of their peril, are we to withhold from them any settlement or adjustment? Are we not going to try to assist them as we are trying to relieve distress throughout the country and the Nation?

If we do not make some provision to try to assist these men, we are ignoring the biggest group of the people of America who hold an asset which should be recognized for credit upon which they should obtain some help from the Government at this time.

I very much hope the Senate will see fit to agree to this amendment. The whole bill has to go into conference with the House; and if this amendment should be adopted my confident belief is that it will do more people good, assist more in relieving distress, do more toward eliminating unemployment, and assist a greater number of people than any other provision we have in this measure; and that is the main basis upon which we are enacting relief legislation for the assistance of the people of this country.

I hope that at least a majority of the Senators will agree to the adoption of this amendment. It has gone pretty well over the country, and I think Congress has been more harshly criticized than it should have been, that Congress and the administration have been very unmindful of the necessity of rendering any direct assistance to the people of this country. I think probably that criticism is more or less merited, but the people have been rather severe about it. They have even gone so far as to charge improper motives on the part of those in authority. I do not think any of the Members of Congress entertain improper motives. I do not think any of the officials are actuated by such motives; but it just seems that some people in certain environments are not able to comprehend the entire situation.

They have lived too much in a contracted environment and they want everybody to bow down to what they think should be done, without making some concessions and without trying to bring about a harmonious plan that would be as far-reaching as possible.

That is one of our great troubles. I do not set myself up as a critic, but that is one great trouble. Some one just wants to loan money to corporations and banks and not to loan money to anybody else. Some people think that we can assist the country only by pumping a little more life into the railroads of the country, and they do not care whether we assist anybody else or not. We have reached a condition in this country where such a policy as that does not meet the requirements, the needs of the country. We must have a decidedly broader vision. We must take the position that the business affairs of this country, the life and the activities of the average individual, are all so interwoven and so interdependent one upon another that we can not produce prosperity in the Nation merely by helping a particular class of people. We must try to assist all, and then we will bring about a greater degree of happiness and more of a restoration of normal conditions, which we hope and pray for in this country.

It was said when we enacted the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill that we were going to have the banking facilities of the country made more available and we were going to loosen up credits, and that would assist the average business man of the country, would assist agriculture and those who should have reasonably liberal banking facilities.

Absolutely nothing has been accomplished along that line. I do not remember the exact figures, but within a week or two I read that instead of an expansion of credit through the financial institutions of our country, since about last January there had been a contraction of credit through the banking institutions of a billion dollars. They said the people have been paying off the banks. Well, of course, we know why the people have been paying them off. Most of them had to do it. That is the reason why they have been paying off the banks. So we have gotten no expansion of credits, we have gotten no expansion of currency through any of the plans that have heretofore been devised. It would be just as well to declare those operations a failure, except in so far as they may have aided in averting the catastrophe, as some claim, which was hanging over the country; that is all.

Take our Farm Board relief legislation. What has that accomplished? I do not know whether it has accomplished anything or not. I do not see how the prices of wheat, cotton, and other agricultural commodities could have gone much, if any, lower without the Farm Board. They are about the lowest in the history of the country. It is possible, of course, that they might have gone still lower.

I can not understand why those in authority are always playing favorites with the financial institutions of the country, to the disregard of the general public welfare. I can not understand that. Take the stock market in New York City. When we first began to talk about the evils of the stock market and short selling and manipulation and pools upon the stock market, Mr. Whitney, the head of the stock exchange, said that it was necessary to have short selling, and that the stock market should be left absolutely alone. The values on the stock market have gone down many millions of dollars. We know of the manipulations and the rascality and the scheming that has been carried on upon the stock market in this country. We know of the rascality and the scheming that has been carried on by the international bankers of this country, to the detriment of the American people. We know all that; yet some seem to think that every time we want to try to bring back a little life-blood and a little assistance to the people of the Nation we have to go through those channels exclusively.

I want to see them do well; but, thinking of the millions and millions of the people of this country who are independent of these institutions, I think we ought to try to reach some of them directly. The old plan does not seem to be a very great success, and I propose here this plan—of course, we have had it before us on another occasion for the full amount—which I believe will reach a very large number of our people and will do a great deal of good and will be an act of recognition of the valor, the patriotism, and the heroism of these men who defended the Nation in its hour of peril that will receive the commendation and the approval of at least 80 or 90 per cent of the American people.

Of course there are some who will not approve of it—some few who think that they will not be able to get quite so much on account of legislation of this character. They will not approve of it. We can not eliminate this element of selfishness that seems to be rather embedded in probably all of us. We can not eliminate that; but here we are representing all the people. Here we are trying to do the greatest good to the greatest number of our American people; and that should be our governing motive in dealing with this and with all other legislation.

During the fight on the tax bill I would receive a telegram one day from a person urging that a certain tax should not be imposed, that tax affecting that person. The very next day I would receive a telegram from the same person saying he thought a certain other tax ought by all means to be imposed, because that tax did not affect him. I think that is rather the way when we come to the question of relief legislation. One element wants something that they hope will help them, and I do not blame them for that.

Another element prays that some relief may be given that will help them, and so it goes throughout the different elements, and none of them are able to come into a harmonious plan for the purpose of trying to render general assistance to the entire people. I do not mean that we can give everyone a dollar or twenty dollars or a hundred dollars, but relief should be made as general as possible, and under such a plan there would be far more probability of bringing about better conditions in this country than by restricting the relief plans to very limited channels.

I very much hope the Senate will see proper to adopt the amendment.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, with much enthusiasm and absolutely no hope, I ask unanimous consent that until the Senate shall have finally disposed of the pending bill no Senator shall speak more than five times or more than five minutes unless he has something to say. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suppose the Senator meant his little pleasantry as a thrust at me.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not see how that possibly could be. There was nothing to evidence it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. He sits around and prays for a vote and prays for an opportunity to go to the Democratic convention. I do not know why he is so longing and so worried because he can not go there. As far as I am concerned, I think the interests of the people of America are decidedly of more importance than attending the Democratic convention.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am unable to understand why Senators do not want a record vote on this subject. I am very much surprised and disappointed. I thought at least 12 or 15 hands would be raised favoring a record vote.

Mr. KING. I think we have already put ourselves on record.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The Senators have not put themselves on record on this proposition.

Mr. KING. We have had a vote on what is really somewhat of a sister to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 103, between lines 19 and 20, the Senator from Illinois proposes to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Within the foregoing limitations of this section, the corporation may make loans to any State for the purpose of making temporary advances to municipalities, counties, or other political subdivisions within such State to pay the amount of the salaries and compensation of their employees payable during the year 1932 or prior years and which remain unpaid on the date this section, as amended, takes effect, if provision has been made in accordance with the law of such State for the payment of such salaries and compensation out of the proceeds of taxes levied for such purposes prior to such date, and if, in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation, such municipalities, counties, or other political subdivisions are unable to obtain funds upon reasonable terms through banking channels or from the general public and the corporation will be adequately secured."

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I recognize it is the desire of the Senate to vote on the pending measure, and I desire to aid it. I beseech the Senate to allow me a second of its consideration while I explain the purpose of this amendment.

I desire to reveal that it is the object to borrow money in the name of the municipality of Chicago, and that of the board of education, or either, with the object of paying the salaries, for a year past due, of the school-teachers, who are in great want and enduring indescribable distress.

There is some confusion here on the part of many Senators, for whose judgment I have very great respect, who seem to think that the words in the bill "of liquidating character" prevent institutions such as a city or a board of education from borrowing, because neither is a commercial organization.

I desire to present to the Senate the single thought, and with it the single expression, that the object is to cure that, if there be a doubt, in order that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, if in exercising its discretion it shall conclude that the applicant, to wit, the school board, is entitled to the money to pay the school-teachers who have long waited for their compensation and are now in distress as the result of the loss of it, may do so; and the provision of the amendment is that they may do so whenever in their judgment it is seen that the banks are without funds and the local authority has also been exhausted.

I respectfully ask of the Senate that they consider the amendment, with the object I have presented, to allow the local board and the city to go to the corporation in order that the salaries which up to the present time have not been paid, and which have left the officials to whom they are due in such distress and want, shall be compensated in the form of a loan, in the meantime that loan resting upon security that shall meet the discretion and the approval of the corporation.

I thank the Senate for its consideration.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, only on such a motion would I take the time of the Senate at this late hour, when I know how anxious Members are to dispose of the pending measure and recess or adjourn.

Yesterday there came to the Capital City a great and representative delegation of the citizens of the second city in the United States. They came here most reluctantly, and only as a last resort, in a great and extreme crisis in that community. That delegation was headed by the mayor of the city, the Hon. Anton J. Cermak, a Democrat, and with him came Fred W. Sargent, the president of the Chicago & North Western Railroad Co.; Mr. Kelly, the president of one of the great State Street concerns, both of the latter gentlemen directors of the largest bank west of the Allegheny Mountains. With them came the representatives of various municipal corporations included within the county of Cook, and the different corporations forming the municipal corporation of the city of Chicago. There came also the representatives of the school-teachers of Chicago, of the firemen of Chicago, of the policemen of Chicago, and of almost every great interest of that great city, from the highest interest in the way of capital and aggregated wealth to the interest of the humblest citizen, the man who sweeps the streets of that great commonwealth. All were represented here yesterday in this Capital.

They came here because for the last three years, owing to protracted litigation on the part of thousands of taxpayers in that city, the taxation and collecting authorities of Chicago have been unable, prevented by tax objections, to collect the taxes due the city, now aggregating more than $252,000,000.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Has any effort been made to have the State government of Illinois come to the assistance of the city of Chicago?

Mr. GLENN. Oh, yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. With what result?

Mr. GLENN. There have been three or four special sessions of the legislature to take care of emergency relief and distress matters. At the last session they voted a note issue of eighteen and a half million dollars, about 95 per cent of which was allocated by the State of Illinois to the county of Cook, in which Chicago is located. They sold in the first great drive about eleven million of those notes. They are 6 per cent notes of the State of Illinois, payable out of an additional gasoline tax of 1 cent a gallon.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the city has already received the money raised by notes issued by the State of Illinois in the sum of $9,000,000?

Mr. GLENN. No; there have been sold out of that issue of notes all but about a million dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. How much all together?

Mr. GLENN. Sixteen to seventeen or seventeen and a half million dollars.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the city has received seventeen and a half million dollars from the State of Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. I say the city; it went to an unemployment-relief fund known as the governor's unemployment relief fund, for the purpose of affording relief.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand the purpose of this amendment is to pay employees of Cook County. Am I correct?

Mr. GLENN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the money that has been given to the county by the State of Illinois, or loaned by the State of Illinois, was for general relief, and not to pay salaries?

Mr. GLENN. For general relief; but this is all a part of the general relief program. These school-teachers have not been paid for 14 months. The testimony yesterday was that numbers of them were sleeping in the parks and going in the morning from the public parks of the city of Chicago to teach the children of the city of Chicago.

Mr. BORAH. That is in the city of Chicago?

Mr. GLENN. That is in the city of Chicago.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Is the credit of the State of Illinois such that it can issue bonds or notes and raise funds?

Mr. GLENN. They have been unable to sell these notes except by a great public-spirited drive of the people of Chicago. They sold $4,000,000 of the notes there in one day, when the relief stations were about to close, and that only because it was represented there that if those relief stations closed not only these school-teachers and these firemen and these policemen would be starving but that 600,000 other people who had been fed daily at those relief stations would be in a starving condition.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the state of the credit of the State of Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. The state of the credit of the State of Illinois is low, and I will tell the Senator why. It is because half of the revenues of the State of Illinois come from the county of Cook. For three years the State of Illinois has not received its taxes from the county of Cook, so it has been deprived of that revenue and has been unable to meet certain bond interest which is due, and those bonds are in default for that reason, and that reason alone.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Does the amendment propose to pay the unpaid employees of the State of Illinois also?

Mr. GLENN. Oh, no; the amendment proposes that a loan be authorized to any State—and we have in mind, of course, the Illinois situation—for the purpose of the State advancing to its political subdivision money for one purpose, and one purpose only, and that is for the payment of wages due and to become due this year to its employees. We have talked about this being an unemployment-relief plan. There has been much debate here as to what percentage of the funds would go to wages if the funds were advanced for highway purposes or for building-construction purposes. Every single dollar of this money will go for wages.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the bonded indebtedness of the State of Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. What is the per capita indebtedness of the State of Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. I do not know.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The Senator does not know?

Mr. GLENN. No; I do not know the exact indebtedness.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. My own State of Massachusetts borrowed on short-term notes within a month large sums of money at the rate of 1.1 per cent. I can not understand why the great State of Illinois is in such a bankrupt condition that its credit is not able to raise sufficient funds to pay the employees of the city of Chicago.

Mr. GLENN. There is $252,000,000 of past-due taxes tied up in lawsuits.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But if there is no indebtedness they ought to be able to raise the money.

Mr. GLENN. Oh, but there is indebtedness of the State of Illinois. We have had a road-building program to bring prosperity to Illinois. We issued $60,000,000 of hard-road bonds. We followed that up with another issue of $100,000,000 of hard-road bonds. We built a waterway with which Senators here are familiar.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I think we ought to have some evidence of the per capita indebtedness of the State of Illinois. The per capita indebtedness of the Federal Government is $135. There is scarcely a State in the Union whose per capita indebtedness is over $10. If the per capita indebtedness of Illinois is but a few dollars, it does not seem to me the State can come with good grace and ask credit of the Federal Government.

Mr. GLENN. Perhaps not——

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I want to say, if the Senator will permit me, that I am ready and prepared to go the limit in using the credit of the Federal Government to help any State that is in financial difficulty, but I refuse to have the Federal Government lend its credit to counties, towns, municipalities, or cities. I do not think we have any more right to deal with them than we have to deal with a minor child rather than the parents.

Mr. GLENN. The Senator from Massachusetts does not comprehend the amendment apparently. We do not propose to lend the credit of the Federal Government to municipalities or counties or subdivisions. We lend the money to the State of Illinois, and we will have back of it the credit of the State of Illinois. I assume that if the State of Illinois sees fit to advance money to Chicago, it will only be after a very clear demonstration is made to the general assembly of the State, because down-State Illinois controls the general assembly, and there is usually the most bitter fight over such matters.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Are the governor and the legislature asking for this credit from the Federal Government?

Mr. GLENN. The governor and the legislature have been in special session repeatedly. They send word here. They had their representatives here yesterday, people who have been working with this problem all the time. They say it is a matter of last resort. The mayor of Chicago, Mr. Cermak, made the statement yesterday that no one knows how serious the situation is in Chicago. It is said that unless they get relief of this character, and get it soon, the policemen—and there are 500 less of them now than when the mayor came into office, and their wages have been very substantially reduced—can not maintain themselves longer. The school-teachers have been unpaid for 14 months. The firemen are unpaid. The garbage workers struck yesterday because they are unpaid.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We are fully aware of the very serious condition the Senator describes in the city of Chicago, but I want to know whether the governor is here or is the legislature here petitioning the Federal Government to lend its credit to the State of Illinois to help the city of Chicago?

Mr. GLENN. The governor is not here to-night.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Was he here yesterday?

Mr. GLENN. No; he was not here yesterday.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The municipal authorities of Chicago were here?

Mr. GLENN. Yes; the municipal authorities of Chicago were here and all those representatives to whom I have referred, including the chairman of one commission after another appointed by the governor, speaking, I take it, with some assurance from the governor.

I just want to lay the matter before this body and then I shall have done my duty. I thought the facts should be laid before the Senate. These men came down here not wanting to come, but the mayor said that they are having meetings of 5,000 communists there, one after another, day after day, and that unless some relief comes there will be 600,000 families in Chicago unfed. If the firemen continue unpaid, they can not act forever, and pretty soon there will be no firemen in Chicago. Pretty soon there will be no policemen in Chicago to cope with the rising spirit of riot and revolution that is about to come upon us there.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. DICKINSON. Was there not a proposal of some sort in the legislature at Springfield during the winter intended for relief of this kind? Was there not a State bond issue to help out the very situation the Senator is describing?

Mr. GLENN. That is what I have told about, the note issue of $18,000,000 for relief, which was voted by the legislature and 90 or 95 per cent of it allocated to Chicago, but it will all be gone very soon. That does not pay the school-teachers or the firemen or the policemen.

We are talking here about relief. It seems we are perfectly willing to vote to relieve all sorts of corporations if they will start building tunnels or viaducts or bridges or any other sort of work that will pay a portion of the money in wages, but when the third State of the Union comes and offers to pledge its credit and back of it the credit of the second city of the United States upon a proposition which will be devoted 100 per cent to wages, then objection comes. I do not criticize anyone for objecting, but what is wrong with advancing money for a 100 per cent payment of wages?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. We have recently passed a measure providing $300,000,000.

Mr. GLENN. Yes; but $300,000,000 for what?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. To lend money to the States for the purpose of relieving distress and misery in the States upon the representation of a State that it can not take care of its own distressed condition.

Mr. GLENN. That is not based upon need. It is based upon population. Illinois would be entitled to about $17,000,000 out of that, and our experience is that the needs of the distressed people come 90 per cent from urban areas. But we pay no attention to needs in that bill. Oh, no; a rural State gets the same amount per capita as does an industrial State. The Senator from Massachusetts knows as well as anyone, I think, that this distress is in the cities, primarily in the industrial centers. Eighteen million dollars will not be a drop in the bucket.

Mr. HAWES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. HAWES. As I understand it, the Senator from Massachusetts is concerned with only one subject.

Mr. GLENN. I do not know about that.

Mr. HAWES. That is whether this fund would go to the State or would go to the municipality. As I understand the amendment, the money would go to the governor of the State to be allotted to the city of Chicago, and if he does not choose to allot it to the city of Chicago, then Chicago does not get it; so that, therefore, the governor of the State accepts the money and the responsibility for its distribution. Is that correct?

Mr. GLENN. It goes to the State of Illinois to be allotted to any political subdivision for the sole purpose of paying wages.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Will the Senator comment on this phase? How does it happen in the face of a desperate municipal situation of this character that the situation does not sufficiently appeal to those citizens who have not paid their taxes in three years to discontinue at least temporarily their litigation and come to the rescue of their own community?

Mr. GLENN. We have about 200,000 tax objectors. The public-spirited citizens of Chicago have come to the rescue; the great industries, the great concerns, the wealthy people, almost without exception, have paid their taxes; but there has been organized a taxpayers' strike. There are thousands of them. The promise has been held out to those people that they can save half of their taxes and they may save all of their taxes. The proposal has been made to them "Give us one-third and we will take a chance." There has been a decision of the supreme court within the last 30 or 60 days holding against those objectors and holding the assessments valid, and the money is going to begin to come in soon. That was a verbal opinion. At this session of the supreme court, convened in June, a written and final opinion is expected, and then those taxpayers will have to pay their taxes. The $252,000,000, according to the statement of the mayor of Chicago and the city comptroller, will in large proportion soon be available to pay off the Federal Government or to pay off the State of Illinois for any advances made.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. GLENN. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I understand that the $252,000,000 of tax delinquency is due to the fact that there are protestants against the validity of the taxes.

Mr. GLENN. So I am advised.

Mr. BLAINE. For how long a term has the litigation which is in progress been before the courts of Illinois?

Mr. GLENN. The unpaid taxes run back for three years.

Mr. BLAINE. Then, is not the Senator indicting the courts of his State? It seems to me three years is a long time in which to get a decision on the validity of a tax assessment.

Mr. GLENN. There was one assessment after another that has been passed upon and that has been involved in the litigation. It is a long, continuous grind of involved and intricate litigation.

Mr. BLAINE. But the first protestants must have gone to court and that must have been in litigation for some three years. It would seem to me that three years is a long time for the courts to take to decide so important a question.

Mr. GLENN. It is a long time.

Mr. BLAINE. It is a long time when we consider that the very sovereignty of the State of Illinois is at stake.

Mr. GLENN. There is not one lawsuit but thousands of them. I am not familiar with the litigation except in a general way.

Mr. BLAINE. I was going to ask why the State of Illinois has not put its house in order long ago——

Mr. GLENN. I wonder myself.

Mr. BLAINE. And provided, as many States have provided, that before there can be any contest over an alleged invalid tax the taxpayer must first pay the tax into the Treasury, wherever that tax may be due, and then proceed to litigate the validity of the tax.

Mr. GLENN. I think it would be a very wise provision. Unfortunately it has not been enacted in our State. But that is not the fault of those teachers, firemen, policemen, and street sweepers. If we are to furnish emergency relief and if it is to be furnished for wages, it must be done here. We will have back of it not some speculative contracts, but we will have back of it the credit of the third State in the Union and of the second city in the Union. If anything is good in this country, if anything is coming out of this great economic upheaval, then the credit of Illinois and Chicago is bound to come; and if it does not, then the whole country is doomed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that is the very thought that is running through my mind. When the city of Chicago and the great State of Illinois come here for money to pay their teachers, it occurs to me that in all probability the "jig" is up.

Mr. GLENN. It may be. I do not believe it is, however. It is a desperate, unfortunate, and embarrassing situation. I would be derelict in my duty, it seems to me, when the most representative people of Chicago come here and ask me to present the matter to the Senate, if I did not do so. They are all high-class people, and I include all of them, the representatives of labor, the representatives of the school-teachers, of the policemen, the firemen, and all the others. They have come here because of a situation for which they themselves are not responsible.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, no newspapers in the United States have been so severe upon Congress for the program which it has undertaken, both with reference to voting relief and with reference to taxes imposed, as have the newspapers of the city of Chicago.

Mr. GLENN. That does not include all the newspapers, and in any event I do not believe we should penalize a suffering school-teacher or a starving child because some Chicago newspaper does not meet our views in the discussion of public problems.

Mr. BORAH. I assume that the Chicago newspapers must be advised as to the situation, and they certainly must speak the voice of the people of that city, to some extent.

Mr. GLENN. I know that a number of the school-teachers were furnished money to come here by two of the great newspapers of Chicago—at least, I was so advised by them; their trip was really financed by two of the great newspapers of Chicago in order that they might present this situation.

The mayor of the city said—and I heard him say it twice yesterday—that riots were almost sure to come, that he feared they would come, unless some means were provided.

I have laid this matter before the Senate. I am not a resident of Chicago, but I know if the Senate wants to relieve distress, if it wants the money which is to be loaned to be used to pay wages, it has an opportunity here to carry out that policy. If the Senate wants the Government to get the money back, it has a certainty of getting it back; and if it is better for the Government of the United States to advance money which will all be devoted to paying wages and which will all be returned rather than to gamble and speculate and theorize about lending money to finance the sale of grain to Europe, to finance so-called self-liquidating projects such as tunnels, viaducts, toll bridges, and similar enterprises. The Senate has a chance to choose between those two theories.

If the amendment shall be adopted and the money shall be advanced, it will all be repaid. The State of Illinois will be able to pay its debts; the city of Chicago will be able to pay its debts.

The present mayor of Chicago has reduced the expenditures of the city to a minimum. A committee of experts made a survey and considered every possible economy which could properly be made, and asked the council and the mayor to put the economies recommended by them into effect. The city council and the mayor not only put them into effect in the last budget, but went beyond the suggested economies, and reduced the amount $3,000,000 more than great business leaders of Chicago, members of that committee, recommended.

Mr. President, let me call attention to another situation which is indicative of the change of heart in Chicago in the administration of its public affairs. Much of the public debt of that great community came from the Sanitary District, which is a separate corporation from the city of Chicago itself. Not long ago there were 4,600 employees of that Sanitary District, but finally the people rebelled at the riotous extravagance of that Sanitary District, which I do not justify but which I condemn, and in this new era different people were voted into power, and now they have reduced the number of employees of that Sanitary District from 4,600 or 4,700 to about 1,000.

Chicago, I believe, has learned her lesson. She has for years looked complacently upon extravagant municipal expenditures, upon the excessive building of highways and parks and playgrounds and all those things; but now pay day has come. It is not the fault of the Federal Government; it is not the fault of the Senate; it is not my fault or the fault of the public officials now in office in the city of Chicago. This crisis was not brought about by the men now in charge.

They come here asking the Congress to help them deal with a crisis of a severity unknown before in all the history of that great city, which in a century has sprung up from a dismal swamp to be one of the great cities of all the world. They only ask this credit for a short time; every dollar will go for wages, and every dollar will be repaid.

Mr. LEWIS obtained the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. LEWIS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, my inclination at first blush was to vote against this amendment. There are a good many reasons why one would be justified in voting against this. I had not any idea when I heard the amendment talked about days and weeks ago, as I have heard it talked about, that I would ever vote for it; but, Mr. President, I can not turn my eyes away from the picture which we have now before us. It seems to me that we are confronted with a situation which should cause us, regardless of the past, to go to the relief of the city of Chicago.

I have no friendship particularly for the city of Chicago and I have no friendship for the great newspapers of that city, and especially the one that claims to be the greatest newspaper in the world, which has slandered practically every Member of the Senate and has carried the idea in its daily editorials that the Senate of the United States is a tool of Capone and his gang because some of us who are on the Judiciary Committee thought that Judge Wilkerson was not a fit appointee for the Federal bench. Day after day that sheet has hurled epithets and innuendoes against the Senators who were opposed to the confirmation of this man on the ground that we were influenced by the Capone gang. Every sinew in one's body rebels against the indecent, malicious innuendoes which have been hurled against the Judiciary Committee and against the Senate because of the attitude some Senators have taken regarding that nomination. So no appeal coming from such a source as that, although that newspaper claims to be the greatest newspaper in the world, would ever induce me to come to the support of anything or anybody because of its advocacy.

But, Mr. President, we are confronted now with a condition the like of which I think we never before beheld.

In my judgment it has an important bearing upon the national aspect of unemployment. It has an important bearing, I believe, upon the crisis which is confronting us in our efforts to save this country from ruin. If what the Senator from Illinois has pointed out should happen in Chicago—and it seems reasonable to think that unless some relief comes it will happen—it may be the start of something that before it ends will include the entire Government of the United States.

The men and the women to whom relief will go, if relief shall be granted, are not to blame for the situation which exists. The school-teachers of Chicago, who, the Senator says, are sleeping now in the parks of that city because they have no money with which to pay for rooms and board, are not to blame for this distress. The officials are not to blame, it seems to me. But we are confronted with a condition which we must take as it presents itself to us. We can not turn our eyes and our backs upon suffering of that kind, no matter what the cause may be. Regardless of technicalities and regardless of cause, we ought to help the suffering people of Chicago if we have any way on earth of helping them.

> The quality of mercy is not strain'd;
> It droppeth as the gentle dew from heaven
> Upon the place beneath: it is twice bles'd;
> It blesseth him that gives, and him that takes.

It seems to me we are confronted now with a condition where immediate relief is demanded and is necessary, regardless of the cause of that condition.

I presume in due time the tax cases will be decided by the courts; I agree with Senators when they say there is no excuse—and there is none, so far as I am able to see—for the long delay; but the delay has taken place, and the condition is as has been described to us by the Senator from Illinois. No one, as I understand, disputes it. There is not any question about what the conditions are. So, whatever the cause, if we have any way of relieving the deplorable conditions, we ought to relieve them, as a matter of humanity, regardless of the kind of people involved, although undoubtedly most of them who will get this relief are very high-class people.

Regardless of the unenforcement of law in Chicago, and the domination of the city to a great extent by gangsters and outlaws, if there is not any other way for them to secure relief, and we can give it to them, we ought to give it, and it seems to me that there can be no excuse for not doing so. I believe we are justified in laying aside technicalities and everything else which may be in the way and going to the limit of our ability to grant relief.

The people involved are our compatriots; they are the same as the people in other parts of the United States; they are moved by the same impulses; they suffer from the same causes. It seems impossible for them to secure relief in any other way. Firemen and policemen and teachers can not get food because they can not be paid on account of these delays. So, temporarily, they ought to be relieved. I believe it will only be a temporary matter, for I can not imagine that the great State of Illinois and the great city of Chicago are going permanently to remain in this condition. If they are, and if there is no way to relieve the situation, then we might just as well close up shop and realize that it is only a question of a short time until the entire country will collapse.

Mr. President, if we were moved only by selfish reasons; if we were moved only by the idea that we want to save the country from destruction and from catastrophe—and I think we are probably moved by a higher motive than that, although that is a noble and good motive—but if that were the only consideration involved it would pay us, it seems to me, to stretch forth the hand of relief in this case; to do our share, to do all we can to extend credit to the people of Chicago so that they may again be put on their feet and placed in a respectable condition.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] desires to address the Senate on this situation. As I observe him making memoranda, I would rather yield to the Senator and close the subject with what I shall have to say in a few moments.

Mr. BORAH. I have not anything to say.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] accurately referred to the fact that this particular amendment, its contents and its meaning, had been frequently referred to on the floor of the Senate. In that he was quite correct, as it was myself who was its author. I do not arise to offer an improvement or addition to the complete presentation made by my colleague, Senator GLENN. I come forward to reinforce by personal knowledge the situations as described by others at an early part of the discussion of the first bill looking to general relief. I tendered the amendment which would give the privilege to lend money to municipalities. This was on my expressed theory that they might remedy the conditions of distress with which they were being cursed. I had conferred with the Senators from New York and California in regard to the matter.

They were cooperating with me. There was a very serious question in the minds of many of the eminent Senators and counselors at law, Members of this body, as to whether we could lend to a municipality direct.

I wish to have it understood by Senators, with whom there is always perfect frankness and respect for confidences, that I had a conference with the President of the United States upon the subject. He very freely expressed the fears which had been expressed to him that if the bill provided for the advancing of money to municipalities, it would soon involve loans to so many cities of America that the moneys would be exhausted; and he intimated something along the line to which the eminent Senator from Nebraska has made some allusion, which the inference of the Senator from Idaho correctly drew from one of his observations—that is, to the method of government which had prevailed corruptly in certain of the municipalities—and he justly alluded to the danger of this money being consumed in the hands of those whose conduct was not altogether commendable in municipal office.

It was finally concluded, however, that such dangers could be avoided if the measure could revive the theory of the advance to the governor of the State, after the order of a bill that had been before this honorable body and well considered by all of its Members, and the governor could be given the authority to advance to these different municipalities, leaving in his judgment the discrimination and the security that could reward the claim of the municipality and meet the call of its distress.

But, sirs, when the bill came forward eminent gentlemen in this body, good lawyers and those of philosophic frame of mind in economic government, feared that the expression "self-liquidating" compelled the loan to the municipality, even though, through the governor, to be only such loan to such locality and division as in itself was self-liquidating. It was esteemed that as a board of education was an institution of learning, or that which directed one, it was not in such commercial creation or commerce production as would present a self-liquidating character of commerce or industry. The present amendment being proposed has for its purpose carrying out the idea that was expressed as in the mind of the President and of this honorable body; yet to remove the doubts expressed by some when the expression to which I have referred was felt necessary to be included in the bill this amendment is now tendered to remove the feared obstruction.

Mr. President, I apologize to the Senate; I know the lateness of the hour—it is now past midnight—but there never was a sudden emergency more serious than this which is now being presented for your consideration. My eminent colleague [Mr. GLENN], who, while he says he is not a resident of Chicago, has his law office there, one of the great law firms—thus he is so well acquainted with the conditions that he speaks with the same information as one residing there a lifelong era at the city. I ask you to note this, and, Senators, I beseech your attention to this thought and query.

What do you think has brought the great city of Chicago to the condition that is being confessed here, similar to that which is afflicting other great cities of your Nation?

Will you sit here silent or blind to the fact and deaf to the truth that the affliction upon this community of my home—this Chicago that has so bountifully honored me—has been laid upon it by the Government? Who put these people in millions out of employment at Chicago; who sent them to the number of 600,000 walking up and down the streets, penniless and pitiful, and now in thousands and thousands, to be found where they lie out upon the soggy earth and sleep with the rains pattering upon their bodies, while their children die beside them, starving for bread; the babes upon the sunken bosoms of mothers, the founts of life dried by want and choked to hardness by chill and dampness of the earth and sky—these babies in numbers to be found dead in the morning because of the failure through inability of the community to extend a charity that could have saved them from the misery that they endured and the agonies of death that tortured them? Did Chicago do this? Did her million of toilers cast themselves out of employment? Was the beggary and misery that is inflicted upon them brought about by their own hand?

These teachers who are now sleeping in the parks, with their educational qualifications fitted for higher and nobler things—were they destined to this unhappy state by conduct of their own? Is it not clear to you that this Government, by the processes through which it has conducted the affairs of our countrymen, has reduced these millions to the beggary where they can not pay the rent of the little habitations which they occupy? The landlord, not receiving the rent for his small premise, is unable to pay the tax to the city; the city, having no tax, therefore, from its property, has no money with which it may pay the salaries of those who toil for it, all of whom are now reduced to the necessity of holding out their hands before the world, crying to their Nation, in the person of this great assemblage, for rescue. Here before this deliberative body they stand in beggary and cry out for charity of their countrymen that they may be saved from starvation and death.

Who has done this thing? Who has laid this community so low that it must stand before the world in pity, in the tears of mankind, or in contempt of the haughty, while it endures the humiliation before the earth?

For a long time there was opposition to an appeal to this body because of that cardinal doctrine of government asserted in divisions which we recognize, of the municipality and the State being severed and separate in their functions of government, the Federal Government to conduct its affairs within itself as should State and city. But, Senators, there is a time when all rules have their exceptions.

The three things are to be brought to your attention, of a very serious nature, justifying the adoption of an exception.

First, here at Chicago is this great aggregation of humanity in the very center of your Republic. The people come from both of your coasts. They have come from every nation of the world, and there in Chicago these collect and in varying forms reside. There is spoken at Chicago every tongue known to civilization. A more varied degree and a larger number of confusing dialects are spoken in the city of Chicago, indicative of the nationalities which prevail there, than exist in any other portion of this earth, or ever have existed during the days of history—paralleled only by the days of old Jerusalem. These people, many of them, have never had a habitation. They are compelled, in these hours of misery, to live in the streets, struggle in hunger, suffer in misery, die in poverty, and to be carried through the streets for burial upon caravans of charity, their bodies to be lost in some distant place where none who shall know them by relation can ever drop a tear upon the bier where their beloved dwell in death.

Gentlemen of the Senate, I ask, what or who brought this deplorable depression upon these people?

Did they bring this disaster upon themselves? Why should any Member of this body cry out upon the technical definitions of government, against the Federal Government coming to the aid of that which it itself inflicted upon these desolated people. It is they who agonize, who now cry out, in their moment of misery, "Behold my estate," they cry, "laid upon me in the very house of my guardian!"

If these school-teachers of Chicago can not be paid, what shall follow; shall we refer to them first? The schools must close in August, and no teaching or guidance of the poor little ones. These little ones, in thousands, have been maintained, sir—hear me—by the teachers, who go hungry to give their little portion to the hungry little ones. These teachers who cry out now that they are hungry and sleeping in the parks yet shall be blessed in the memory of the future generations, for they took the little food that they had, sir, and, denied compensation for services, would drag themselves together, wherever they could, and with the crumbs of life, and feed it to the children whose parents oftentimes they never had known and never hoped to see. Here was the sacrifice that the little ones themselves might be preserved, that they might not die of hunger.

Senators, I am speaking to your attention. I beseech you, I am speaking to you in behalf of children who are helpless; those who are fed by the teachers and maintained in their struggles until the teachers themselves, in hunger for having given up what they had to these helpless children, fall themselves in the public places, starving—to be buried in a pauper's grave.

Is there nothing in this that may appeal to the soul of you as separating the distinction of government which was made in the days of your fathers, when they laid the constitutional fundamentals upon the theory of a successful and prosperous nation?

Now, to the other: Senators, let us face it.

If there shall come the time when again we shall have such a march as we had last week in Chicago, when these teachers paraded up and down the streets demanding something that should give them shelter, and having reached a point so low that the very lowest of that which we speak of in society as "the tramp" was not dropped to the depth to which they had been precipitated—sirs, do you not see that this will be increased by those who shall join them in a great rebelling community such as you know Chicago is and composed of the mystic numbers constituting it? I summon you, then, to reflect on the truth that there is not enough money to pay the officers of law that shall be authorized to maintain the peace. Where will you go for refuge? Shall you carry out the threat of marching the Federal Army into the great city of Chicago, and there have the conflict and precipitate upon your America of another Russia, Austria, Spain? Have you reached the point where, indifferent to this, you are content to bring upon your country the peril which, once started, is as the flame where no hand can quench its fire?

When the eminent Senator from Nebraska and my distinguished friend from Idaho [Senator BORAH] turn to the consideration of the greater question, it is, Shall you preserve yourselves? Do you feel that these predicaments of misery, this unhappy state and condition of destruction, can befall these helpless people without their turning their faces to you to say, "You who have done this thing to me, the Government that my fathers established, that my older fathers died for, at the gates of which my children are being strangled to-day, impoverished in poverty, and dying in hunger, we come to you now to pray you give us but a relief of a temporary surcease of our sorrow and for the night end our agonies; you soon will be repaid by our great Chicago."

First, Senators, who is it that has not paid these taxes that now are said to be in default? Let us reply. It is these master gentlemen, these eminent financiers who speak of themselves as a superior body and allude to us as deficient Senators, as lacking in patriotism and the quality of manhood necessary to a proper measure. Who are they? They are the gentlemen who have put their investments in the untaxed securities of our land, and with their vast stocks and bonds have sealed them up in places where the eye of the tax collector can not see them or the hand of justice lay its touch against them; and with these millions upon millions that they may hold freed and exempted from paying the just dues to the Government they cheat and swindle humanity out of their rights, because there is no way that you have provided in your Federal Government by which they may be reached and brought to the bar of justice or enforce the tax exactments, nor, sirs, forced to contribute the justice in behalf of these who are paying with hunger and death the penalty of the crimes of these masters. These kings of privilege are those who have been permitted to borrow in millions of dollars for their personal uses in their business needs, yet deny to the starving bread to be bought from money lent by the Government for the rescue of the hungry, the starving, the homeless, and the helpless.

Who are the others of whom we speak—and ask rescue? It is those who lose their all in the loss of their little homes. It is here where the tenants live with the landlord; where, if the landlords are to be ejected by being sold out because they can not pay their taxes, the tenants have only the rains of the heavens of God as their shelter. Here they may slumber and sleep, out in the public places where they may go—until the public hearse takes them to the grave. Already the children are on the sidewalks, the little cots on which they sleep have been there for months, rolled against the doorways or ditches of the sobbing highway. They have no covering with which to shield them. Some of them pass for the night and then for the day, and are dead the following to-morrow. Silence alone is their court of mourning, and this a condition brought on by my Government, your Government, the conditions of your Government, applying too universally, and all threaten as we deplore the dread to-morrows. But let us not forget those for whom we have come with the appeal. They have not put the curse and the affliction on those who ask some little relief. They give you notice that the money is being held up by court decision. You ask why is there no decision. Who is it holding up the courts—let us speak truly—it is these masters who can afford to pay eminent counsel, and, through the different mutations of the courts, from the law's delay, which Hamlet well described, hold on for such a length of time that they can kill off, with the long delay, those who are opposing their encroachments. They it is who are throttling up so long in the courts in final conclusion. They pursue the well-known methods, and now, if it be true that such as they are trying to put in high judges who have done this act on the people through the committee presided over by the eminent Senator from Nebraska, he or anyone else would be justified in his condemnation.

But I ask the question and conclude, in your generous attention to me, in what way do any of these things exempt these people who now pray for deliverance from the relief they ask? Why should they be punished in poverty and with a decree of death to their children, because the systems of government have not been qualified to meet and oppose in the emergency that in the hour bears so heavily on their bent and naked backs?

These teachers who have given all they have had to these little ones of whom they know nothing of family or birth yet try to save by feeding them from their own sunken bosoms with the last drain of life—to these there can come the compensation that is theirs in the proclamation of the Holy Master, saying to all, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto Me."

Therefore, Senators, what we speak for this night is that justice, truly that justice described by the great Cardinal Richelieu, who, opposing his oppressive masters, shouted to mankind, "For justice all seasons summer, all places a temple." Sirs, it is here in this temple we turn to you but for that justice that you can distribute to your countrymen as your fellow Americans, that they may turn in gratitude to you and, repaying you fully in compensation for all they have gathered from you, will bless you as those who saved them as Americans. It is these we present to you before all the children of all the earth. This justice which these pray from you is one they will receive in grateful acknowledgment and which, by your generosity, they are saved and in your sense of justice they are guaranteed to remain to preserve your Nation in turn for your preservation and salvation of these deserving and noble sufferers—your fellow Americans!

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am sure every Senator here sympathizes with the situation described in the city of Chicago. What troubles me about this amendment is the precedent. My own State of Massachusetts has had one city in exactly the same plight as Chicago—the city of Fall River. It became necessary for the State government to take over the financing of that city some three years ago. The affairs of that city—a city of over 100,000 inhabitants—have been conducted by a board of officials named by the governor of the State, and the State has loaned its financial credit to the city, and the city is now, notwithstanding the serious depression, on the way to a sound financial position. Three to five other cities are in exactly the same situation, and there have constantly been rumors that similar action would have to be taken in regard to those cities.

I also have heard, and do continue to hear from time to time, of the steady decline in the receipts of taxes in the industrial communities in my State. Many of the communities have been unable to collect from the assessments of last year more than 60 or 70 per cent of their revenues. If the situation continues, the State will undoubtedly have to assume the financing of the affairs of a number of municipalities.

Mr. President, I inquire who are these officials of the city of Chicago who are unpaid? School-teachers, firemen, and policemen. They are not officials of Chicago; they are officials of the State of Illinois. The State of Illinois delegates to municipalities the power to preserve order, and to name policemen, and the power and authority to educate children and to name school-teachers.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, then they are officers of the Federal Government, because the Federal Government has that power over the State.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. No; the Federal Government has no power to regulate education and has no power to regulate order within the States.

Mr. GLENN. It has no power to regulate order?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It has no power to prevent crimes in the State of Illinois, except crimes coming under the prohibition law. That is the only class of crimes in which the Federal authorities could interfere in the administration of justice in Illinois.

Mr. GLENN. Does the Senator mean to say that the Federal Government has no power to regulate order in this country?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I say that the responsibility for preserving order is delegated by the State governments to municipalities, and that a police officer is an official of the State.

Mr. GLENN. On that theory a police officer is an official of the Federal Government, because the Federal Government has the necessity of preserving order in this country, and they will be in Chicago, possibly. They have been there before. They were there during the great period when Grover Cleveland was President, during the great distress of that time, and I am afraid, and that is the reason I am here to-night, not because I want to be here in this position, but asking the Senate not to save Chicago or Illinois but to save the United States. There are likely to be Federal troops in there doing the very thing which the Senator from Massachusetts says they have no right to do—preserving order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. If the police force of the city of Chicago goes on strike, it is the responsibility of the State government to see that other policemen are sent in there. The State delegates authority to subdivisions to carry on the work of the State. It gives them a charter for that purpose. These are State functions, the officers are State officials, and the State has the responsibility for the finances, and order, and taxes, and every other activity of the subdivision.

Mr. GLENN. This is going beyond the State. If the ideas of the people here yesterday are realized—and we hope they will not be—I am telling you to-night that a great riot can not be started in Chicago or a revolution started there that will not spread beyond State lines, spread from Chicago into Indiana, and on East. Detroit is afire, almost, with the same feeling.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am sorry to say that I think the Senator exaggerates the situation, and does not really interpret the people of his State. I do not believe there is any revolution developing or growing in any community in this country. To me the astounding feature during this whole depression has been the patience, the orderly manner, and the fine spirit the depressed, unemployed American people have manifested during all of these trying circumstances.

Mr. GLENN. The relation which I make of the fact is not mine, but is simply one coming from the mayor of the city of Chicago, intimately associated with all these activities, and from members of the various bodies appointed by the Governor of Illinois, from both political parties. They tell me this is a real, genuine crisis. Perhaps they are wrong, I hope they are, but it will not be confined to any one State if it starts.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. There is distress in my State, and there are people there who are in great need and great want, who are sacrificing tremendously, but there is not a murmur or a scintilla of revolution or disorder or discontent.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Will the Senator yield to me to make a motion for a recess until to-morrow at 11 o'clock?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I finish? Then I will yield the floor. I would like to finish. All I have to say is just one sentence, to state the purpose of my rising at this time.

I wanted to prevent any precedent being established here that would come back to haunt us in the future. Therefore I propose, if the amendment is to be voted, that the word "State" be inserted in the fourth from the last line after the word "such." This amendment would give authority to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to make loans to any State for certain purposes, "if in the opinion of the board of directors of the corporation such municipalities," and so forth. I propose to insert the word "State."

If the State of Illinois is willing to confess publicly to the whole country that it is unable to finance this situation, then I concede that the Federal Government probably has a responsibility, but I do not concede that because a municipality like Fall River, Mass., or Chicago, Ill., gets into such a financial condition that it can not raise money it should come to the Federal Government for a loan. It must first go to its own State government. The State has that responsibility, I repeat. The State must take over the administration of affairs. The State must take over the financing and first try to straighten the finances out and try to lend its credit to the city and help it. If that fails, if the State is unable to do it, then here is the place to come, I concede, because we can not have these riots which are predicted, or starvation, in Illinois. But the amendment only provides that if a municipality is not able to raise the money, then the board shall lend the money to the State for this purpose. I ask the eminent Senator in charge whether he would be willing to have "State" inserted?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I would like to have the amendment left on the table until to-morrow when we will resume.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, does the Senator from Idaho persist in his determination to make a motion to take a recess?

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator has some suggestion to make, I will withhold the motion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I feel that we ought at least be able to reach an agreement to limit debate on this bill and on amendments hereafter offered.

Mr. BORAH. I should think so.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that in the event the consideration of the bill shall not be concluded to-night, during the further consideration of the bill no Senator shall speak more than once or longer than 10 minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think we all share the hope that we may get a final vote this evening. So far as I am informed, there are only one or two more amendments to be offered, which, I think, will be briefly presented. We have remained here until 12 o'clock, and a few more minutes will work great advantage if we can dispose of the bill. If we go on to-morrow, I am afraid there will be further discussion, and I think that at present I should object to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, my reason for suggesting the unanimous consent in the form in which I presented it was to avert the condition which may arise in the event the Senator from Idaho persists in his motion and the motion should carry. If consent were granted, we would then resume consideration of the bill to-morrow under a limitation of debate. I think it is a sound, sensible thing to do. Here is what will happen: We will come back here to-morrow fresh and invigorated, and we will discover that a number of new amendments may be proposed. We will debate them without limit. Then to-morrow evening we will be in almost the same situation in which we find ourselves to-night. I do not think anyone here objects to the proposal except the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, this is my position: If we are going over until to-morrow, I certainly would want some understanding as to limitation of debate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. We can not get it if the Senate votes a recess.

Mr. McNARY. I appreciate that, but I say I hope we can continue here to-night, and I think if we do we can finish the bill in a very short time.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, if the Senator can secure a unanimous-consent agreement now to limit debate to five minutes upon the part of Senators, I shall not make my motion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that during the further consideration of the bill no Senator shall speak more than once nor longer than five minutes on the bill or any amendment thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and it is so ordered.

The unanimous-consent agreement was reduced to writing as follows:

Ordered, by unanimous consent, That during the further consideration of the pending bill (H. R. 12445) no Senator may speak more than once or longer than five minutes on the bill or on any amendment thereto.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, is not the Senator willing to insert the word "State" before the word "municipalities"?

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, in reply to the Senator from Massachusetts I wish to assert that I would like to have the proposition of my proposed amendment go over until to-morrow in order that I may have time to consider his suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. But we are to go ahead to-night.

Mr. LEWIS. Oh, is it the purpose to continue to-night? I thought my eminent friend had moved a recess. Then, so far as I am concerned, I will adopt the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, if that removes the objection, because I am anxious to have some action on it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I thought the suggestion was that we should get an agreement to limit debate and then recess until to-morrow.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Oh, no!

Mr. JONES. Otherwise I would have objected, so far as that is concerned. I have an amendment I want to offer. I was willing to agree to a 5-minute limitation of debate, but I would like to have a little time to explain my amendment. It seems to me that we ought to recess now until to-day at 11 o'clock. I am going to move that we recess until 11 o'clock this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington. (Putting the question.) The noes seem to have it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The noes have it, and the motion is rejected. The question now is on the modified amendment of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the House text. I am sure there will be no objection, because it strikes out a provision for a public building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Texas proposes to amend the House text by striking out, on page 42, line 6, the words " Seguin, post office ".

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have an amendment I want to offer, and I will make a very brief explanation. Some three days ago I offered the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

SEC. —. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make advances to any State on the security of the bonds of such State, and on such terms and conditions as the corporation deems advisable, for educational or hospitalization purposes within such State.

(b) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of this section the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $200,000,000. Such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. The other day I offered this amendment and withdrew it upon the objection of some who were directing the bill through the Senate with the understanding that it would be offered at the same time the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] would offer as an amendment the bill which we passed the other day authorizing $300,000,000 for relief work to be extended to the States.

It will be recalled that when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was being considered, an amendment quite similar to this was first adopted by the Senate. Then some effort was made to broaden it and we included counties and cities and drainage districts, and then the whole provision was eliminated from that bill. There are certain States where it is impossible, because of market conditions, to sell the State bonds. Certainly the Government would not lose anything by the proposition. I have limited the amendment, reducing the amount from $300,000,000 to $200,000,000, and limiting it to educational and hospitalization purposes. I hope those in charge of the pending measure will accept the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, we now see the predicament we are in on account of the foolish agreement into which we entered just a few moments ago. There are two sets of Senators, one who thought the unanimous-consent proposal meant one thing and one who thought it meant another. I quite agree with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. The agreement was entered into under a misunderstanding. Now we are presented, at 5 minutes after 12 o'clock midnight, with an amendment that involves, as I take it from its reading, $200,000,000 or $300,000,000. It may be the best amendment that has been offered to the bill, but we are to consider it at this time after we have been in session 13 steady hours—and this is the Senate of the United States! This is efficiency! This is the kind of combination now that is on between the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] and his allies on the other side to keep us here all night, perhaps, in order to carry out the command of somebody in the White House.

We are in this predicament now, and we have to go through with it and vote on amendments like this when an eighth-grade schoolboy would know better than to consider things of this importance under that kind of an agreement at this time in the night when we have been in session here steadily for 13 hours. We are expected to legislate; it is expected that we will adjourn on Saturday; and yet here we have before us a most important bill, perhaps the most important bill that has been here during the session. We are now considering amendments. I am not finding fault with the Senator from Mississippi. I am not objecting to his amendment. I do not know what it is. Nobody else knows what it is. The Senator from Mississippi can not tell us in five minutes what it is, and he is not allowed any more time. That is the way we are now asked to legislate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there was no agreement about the matter of going ahead to-night, except that I said I would not make the motion to recess if we could obtain a limitation of debate.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I thought we had debated for several days the limitation on the lending of money through this bill to States, counties, and municipalities. It was entirely limited to certain projects. It does not include loans to States as proposed by the Senator from Mississippi. We have voted that down time and again, and we will vote it down now without any further debate.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, have I used all of my five minutes?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has spoken once, and under the unanimous-consent agreement he may not speak again.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi a question. I want to know what his amendment is about.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator can not give the Senator from Mississippi the floor in that way.

Mr. ASHURST. I want to know what the amendment is about, and I have a right to ask the Senator from Mississippi what his amendment concerns.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is recognized.

Mr. ASHURST. I respectfully insist that I ought to be heard for a moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I do not want this taken out of my time.

Mr. ASHURST. The Senator from Wisconsin has not the floor.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. ASHURST. I ask that the amendment be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has recognized the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ASHURST. What is before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. ASHURST. Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read at the proper time.

Mr. ASHURST. Oh, we will talk about it first and then have it read!

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin has been recognized.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to appeal to leaders on both sides of the Chamber to consider the bill and the amendments which are going to be offered to it with the deliberation which should characterize legislation of this importance. It is all very well to say that Senators should not speak longer than five minutes on any amendment unless we know positively that there are no important amendments yet to be presented. The amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] should not be voted up or down in this Chamber without an opportunity being given to Senators to know what is involved in it. I say, furthermore, that so far as I am concerned I am not going to vote for the bill, with a lot of important amendments to be attached to it to-night under any such limitation of debate as has been entered into to-night, without knowing what is in the bill. We are extending great powers to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation under the terms of the bill. It is proposed to force Senators to choose between voting for or against the measure without knowing what is in it. I say it is disgraceful for the Senate to proceed in this manner with legislation of this importance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be read. The Senate will please be in order so that the reading of the amendment may be heard.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Mississippi offers the following amendment:

On page 103, after line 13, insert the following new section:

"SEC. —. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make advances to any State on the security of the bonds of such State, and on such terms and conditions as the corporation deems advisable, for educational or hospitalization purposes within such State.

"(b) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of this section the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $200,000,000. Such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act."

Mr. TRAMMELL obtained the floor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield to enable me to move a recess?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have only five minutes.

Mr. REED. Would not the Senator prefer to take his five minutes in the morning?

Mr. TRAMMELL. If the Senator desires to make a motion to recess, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, before the motion is made, I desire to apologize to the Chair for the apparent though not real disrespect shown a few moments ago.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appreciates fully the attitude of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. In the event a motion is made to recess and it should carry, would the limitation of debate continue through to-morrow?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the judgment of the Chair.

ADDITIONAL REPORT OF A COMMITTEE

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8750) relative to restrictions applicable to Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 873) thereon.

ADDITIONAL BILL INTRODUCED

Mr. HOWELL introduced a bill (S. 4926) for the relief of the Washington Post Co. (with an accompanying paper); which was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Claims.

AMENDMENT TO DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. McKELLAR submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 12443, the second deficiency appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 2, after line 11, insert the following:

"For payment to the widow of Edward E. Eslick, late a Representative from the State of Tennessee, $10,000."

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. In view of the present situation, if it is agreeable to those present, I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 12 o'clock and 15 minutes a. m.) took a recess until 12 o'clock meridian to-day, Thursday, June 23, 1932.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 22, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Lord and our God, teach us that wisdom which shall enable us to be foremost for truth, for fidelity, for manliness and honor. We pray that these may be the poetry and music of our lives. So direct us that we may inspire rectitude in public sentiment in more views of human rights; may we strive to be associated with those great principles and always ambitious to contribute some great good to society. Give us faith of the future that shall triumph over things seen—the mistakes, the misfortunes which severely wound men. O Master, may we follow Thee, the divine ideal, the safest rule of conduct, the master impulse of the best and highest life, and the surest ground of our eternal hope. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Vice President had appointed Mr. COPELAND as a conferee on the part of the Senate on the bill (H. R. 11361) making appropriations for the Government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of such District for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, vice Mr. GLASS, excused.

ACHIEVEMENTS OF THE PRESENT SESSION OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD a short address that I hope to deliver to-night over the radio.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. I did not hear what the gentleman said, but I think it is all right.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It is an answer to a few remarks my friend from New York made at Chicago. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, which I expect to deliver over the radio this evening:

The Republican National Convention at Chicago has met and adjourned. It adopted a platform so specious and indefinite in all of its planks affecting the public interest that it is not surprising that Senator BORAH upon the floor of the Senate on Monday, made the solemn declaration that "the Republican platform had fallen dead at the feet of the people." It is my purpose to-night to discuss only one phase of the developments at the Republican convention.

If any of you listened in over the radio to the speech of Senator DICKINSON, the key-noter, or to the speech of permanent chairman, Congressman SNELL, you will recall that they both undertook to convince the American people that the Democratic Party was not capable of constructive leadership and cited to support that contention by the activities of the present Democratic House of Representatives in the session now drawing to a close. It is my purpose to-night, as far as it is possible in the limited time, to tell the truth to at least a portion of the American people with reference to the achievements of the present session of the House of Representatives.

It will be recalled that the Democrats only have a majority of five or six in the House, and only a few defections from our ranks make it impossible to control all actions in the House. It will be conceded that from a patriotic standpoint it was the duty of the House Democrats when the session first met to cooperate as far as possible with the urgent recommendations of the President on his emergency program.

The first recommendation made by Mr. Hoover was the passage of the moratorium act, which delayed the collection by our Government of $267,000,000 from our foreign creditors. He urged upon Congress that unless this was done that it would precipitate a devastating collapse in all parts of the world. A majority of the Democrats cooperated in the passage of that bill, but many of us who did so now look back upon it with regret, as we are convinced that it was the entering wedge for a permanent cancellation of all of our foreign debts. Remember this prophecy.

The Democrats also cooperated with the President's recommendation for the passage of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill and placed at its disposal a tremendous credit of $2,000,000,000, the chief purpose of which was to aid railroads, banks, and other corporate institutions.

The Democrats in the House have also assisted in the passage of the President's recommendation for a home loan bank bill, which has passed the House and is now pending in the Senate.

It will thus be seen that the Democratic Party has cooperated with the President in the enactment of all of the major recommendations made by him, and we are not subject to the criticism that we have for partisan reasons sought to embarrass the President's program. However, the three above propositions are mere temporary palliatives and do not go to the roots of our present domestic and international troubles. It has been the policy of the Democratic Party in the House to originate at this session and to pass measures having in view a cure for the terrible conditions now existing in America and in the world. We have conceived that it is a part of wisdom to diagnose the ailment of the patient and to try to prescribe adequate remedies for his recovery. Practically every economist of any reputation has reached the conclusion that one of our basic troubles is the terrible fall in commodity prices, which has worked particular distress to the farmers of America. It is impossible for the farmers to pay debts contracted a few years ago when cotton was 20 cents a pound or wheat $1.50 a bushel with the present price of cotton at 4¼ cents a pound and wheat at 40 cents a bushel. The purchasing power of the gold has been unduly inflated and the price of commodities tragically deflated. There can be no ultimate recovery until this situation is corrected.

We, therefore, passed the Goldsborough bill, the purpose of which is to direct the Federal Reserve Board by their open-market operations, and which they have the power and resources to accomplish, to raise commodity prices for the benefit of all producers. Under the same general line we have passed the Somers resolution urging the President to call an international conference to reestablish the purchasing value of silver and to regulate exchange values between nations. When it is remembered that three-fourths of the people of the world are on the silver basis and that silver is now only worth 25 cents an ounce, it will be seen that in those countries which are the best customers for our exports that their purchasing power has been so greatly reduced that they can not buy our cotton and other raw materials and manufactured goods. In my opinion, the restabilization of the value of silver as a medium of exchange is the most important economic problem now pending in this country or the world. Mr. Hoover has so far declined to take any action on it although he has been requested to do so by both branches of Congress.

Another matter of tremendous importance relating to a return of our foreign trade and the reopening of our American factories and thereby affording a market for the products of our farms is the necessity for adjusting existing intolerable provisions of the Smoot-Hawley Tariff Act. Under the provisions of that act American exports of raw materials and manufactured goods have fallen from five billion two hundred million in 1929 to two billion four hundred million in 1931, and because of the retaliatory tariff walls set up against us by our best foreign customers hundreds of millions of dollars of American capital have been invested in foreign countries in factories and plants, thereby depriving American workmen of enormous opportunities for employment. The Democratic House at this session passed the bill urging the President to call an international conference for the adjustment of this terrible situation in order to make an effort to restore our country to its normal competitive basis in trade with other countries, and Mr. Hoover vetoed the bill, and his veto was sustained by the Republican Party in Congress.

One of the most distressing tragedies that has fallen upon the American people in this depression is the failure of National and State banks, whereby the savings of a lifetime of millions of our people have been swept away, and they have been left heartless and hopeless for no other reason than this Government has never provided any safe system for the protection of depositors in our banks. It is officially stated that in neither Great Britain nor Canada has there been a real bank failure in 40 years, and it is intolerable to have to admit that the financial genius of the American Congress can not enact a law to guarantee the safety of the deposits of our people in their banks. To this end the Democratic House at this session passed the Steagall bank guaranty bill, providing a safe and sane method of protecting the people, but the proposal is being bitterly opposed by the Republican administration and is being chloroformed in the Senate.

It will thus be seen that the four suggested major remedies, seeking a cure for our present ills, have been capably and intelligently handled by the Democratic House and despite Republican opposition. It will continue to be the policy of our party to press for a solution a real cure for our troubles and not to continue to rely upon temporary salves and expedients.

If there is one single issue upon which the taxpayers of America seem to have a crystallized opinion and which they are urging upon Congress with more vehemence than anything else, it is the necessity for economy in Government and the reduction of taxes. Please remember that the President of the United States is directly responsible under the Budget law for making recommendations to Congress with reference to appropriations and the savings in expenditures. It is within his power to recommend appropriations by Congress of no more than is in the Treasury for payment and in fact that is the duty of the President under the law. No one is in as good position as he to know the state of our national finances. He is constantly advised by the Secretary of the Treasury. The President must have known better than anyone else of our constantly amounting deficit, and yet in the recommendations he sent to Congress when we met in December he recommended cuts in appropriations of $331,000,000 less than he is now asking Congress to make.

The Democratic Appropriations Committee, under the leadership of Congressman BYRNS, of Tennessee, at this session has cut appropriations to the very bone and up to this time the bills recommended by that committee have reduced the President's estimates by $161,000,000. In addition to this all economy on appropriation bills in the Senate have been secured through the efforts of Senator MCKELLAR, of Tennessee, and other Democrats in the Senate. The House also set up an Economy Committee of which JOHN MCDUFFIE, of Alabama, is chairman, to further reduce economies not recommended by the President, and on Monday the House passed an economy bill by which $150,000,000 additional will be saved to the taxpayers, so that before this session is closed, including further reductions in pending appropriation bills, it will be seen, that the Democrats in Congress have forced reductions above last year's expenditures between six and seven hundred millions of dollars.

The Democratic House passed the bill to balance the Budget, although a great burden of taxes had to be laid upon the people, which was not covered by the first recommendation of the President because Congress was not informed of the terrific deficit when the tax bill in the House was being prepared. The Democratic House has passed bills providing for the distribution of 90,000,000 bushels of Farm Board wheat for the relief of the hungry of the country and also for the use of 500,000 bales of cotton to be exchanged for clothes for the naked. In order to relieve distressed farmers who had borrowed money from the Federal land banks and who could not meet their payments we set aside $25,000,000 to provide an expansion of loans which, unfortunately, has not been sympathetically administered by the Farm Board. In our efforts to provide work for the unemployed and to continue our good-roads program in the country, we appropriated $132,000,000 emergency funds for that purpose, but the administration in the Senate has so far defeated that bill. We passed the Glass-Steagall bill to increase money in circulation.

For the third time the House has passed a bill to put Muscle Shoals to work for the benefit of agriculture and the development of the Tennessee Valley. The Republican Senate has chloroformed this bill, which was heretofore defeated by two Republican Presidents. The way in which Muscle Shoals has been treated by the Republican Party is the legislative crime of the century.

The lame-duck amendment to the Constitution, which has been rejected heretofore by the Republican Party in the House, has been submitted by us to the people for ratification. The anti-injunction act for the protection of organized labor has been passed by the House. A bill for the independence of the Philippine Islands has been passed. An act to provide for the deportation of alien criminals has been enacted. A bill for the punishment of kidnaping in interstate cases, with heavy penalties, has been enacted.

Recognizing that Congress, in its desperate emergency, was under the duty to pass some bill to relieve unemployment and the absolute starvation and destitution now prevailing among our people, the Democratic House drafted and passed the so-called Garner relief bill under the terms of which $100,000,000 are placed at the absolute disposal of the President to use as he sees fit and through agencies as he may select, to take care of the starving and destitute people when he becomes convinced that local charities and contributions can not further supply them.

The bill also provides for public works, including post-office buildings, rivers and harbors, good roads, and Army camps for the expenditure of $1,000,000,000 and also makes provision for the expenditure of an additional billion dollars through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for loans to States, municipalities, and industries upon adequate security. The Wagner bill pending in the Senate is also of Democratic origin. The Democratic Party in both Houses has taken the initiative in trying to provide funds of an emergency nature for this desperate situation.

So that upon the whole record and when the truth is known to the people of America, it is seen that instead of the Democratic House having failed in the discharge of its duties, it has a splendid record of achievement under all the circumstances.

THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF DILEMMA—THE COUNTRY IS DISGUSTED WITH CONGRESS, WHY—ANTIKIDNAPING BILL

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE DEMOCRATIC TARIFF DILEMMA

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Speaker, in every city, town, and village of this Nation, as well as on the floor of this House, have been heard the angry voices of Democratic orators denouncing the tariff act and berating its supposedly high rates. They have loudly called it iniquitous, outrageous, a robber tariff; all manner of invectives have been used against it and at its door has been laid the blame for all of the ills besetting our world civilization to-day.

Democratic Congressmen have called down the wrath of the gods in demanding lower rates.

Promises, direct and implied, were made by practically every Democratic candidate in 1930 that if the Democratic Party were put in charge of Congress these "iniquitous" rates would be lowered and slashed without hesitation. These promises were made, of course, before these same Democrats gained control of the House of Representatives and were in a position to present to the country the exact kind of a tariff bill, with rates slashed and reduced, as they had promised.

In order to prove the sincerity of their charges that the rates were "robber tariffs" it would have seemed that upon assuming charge of the legislative affairs of the House they would have taken immediate steps to correct a condition which, according to their oft-repeated statements, was the real cause of the world depression and the consequent suffering of to-day. Now that they had a 20 per cent majority on the Ways and Means Committee, from which all tariff bills must come, and a strong working majority in the House itself, there was no reason why a bill should not have been brought out changing these rates and correcting the conditions that they claimed to be so bad. Nevertheless, six months has passed and not one move has been made to make the changes that they promised—or threatened—the country.

During the campaign of 1930, and almost daily since then, my Democratic colleagues from Missouri criticized the tariff rates as being too high. They came into my district and urged the people there to defeat me and elect some one who would vote for lowered protection for labor, agriculture, and industry. Let me refer you to some of the speeches made by Missouri Democratic Congressmen in 1930 and 1931.

On pages 12675 to 12677 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the Seventy-first Congress, under the date of July 3, 1931, JACOB MILLIGAN, Member from the third Missouri district, voiced strong protest against the increased rates in the tariff act.

Going a little farther into the RECORD, I find speeches denouncing the tariff rates as too high and implying thereby a demand for reduction from the following Members of Congress from Missouri:

Hon. RALPH LOZIER, second district of Missouri, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 10820, Seventy-first Congress, second session; Hon. CLARENCE CANNON, ninth district of Missouri, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 12520, Seventy-first Congress, second session; Hon. JOHN J. COCHRAN, eleventh district of Missouri, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 10774, Seventy-first Congress, second session; Hon. WILLIAM L. NELSON, eighth district of Missouri, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 11048, Seventy-first Congress, second session.

While Hon. HARRY B. HAWES, Senator from Missouri, and Hon. MILTON A. ROMJUE made no general speeches against the bill that I could find, yet they voted against it, and it must be presumed that they disagreed with its rates.

I have no doubt but that the new Members of Congress from Missouri have made equally denunciatory statements about the present tariff rates during their campaigns for office, although I do not find where they have raised their voices one way or the other since coming to Congress.

Now, with all this criticism on the part of my colleagues, I naturally expected to find them working as a unit during this session to make good their campaign pledges. Certainly I thought that if my colleagues sincerely felt that the rates of the present tariff bill were as bad as they seemed to believe, and responsible for the depression, they would try to do something to correct the situation, particularly after they found themselves in the majority and charged with the responsibility of the legislative program. Imagine my surprise when I went to the Ways and Means Committee only a few days ago and found that after six months of sessions not one of them had either introduced a bill to reduce a single rate or had appeared before the committee to recommend that such be done.

You can imagine my even greater surprise when I went to the United States Tariff Commission, before which any Member of Congress could appear and request an investigation of the need for reduction in rates for any article, and found that not only had none of my Missouri colleagues complained of a single rate or requested a single reduction but not one Democratic Congressman of the entire majority party had requested even one reduction. This was the status on May 12, 1932, and I am informed that it has not changed to-day.

Now, having found that my Missouri colleagues were making no individual efforts to carry out their campaign pledges, I decided to investigate what other Democratic Members of Congress were doing about it. I did not want to condemn my Missouri colleagues, because I felt that they might be holding back and expecting to support the program of some of the Democratic leaders who like themselves had condemned the tariff rates and pledged their reduction at the first opportunity. I, therefore, went to the committee and secured a copy of every bill introduced by Democratic Members that affected the tariff in any way.

Let me give you a brief summary of what I found. Remember all of the following bills were introduced by Democrats.

Mr. STEWART, of New Jersey, wants a carillon of bells admitted free for a church in his district (H. R. 6173).

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, of Maryland, decided to carry out the pledge of the Democratic Party and offered a bill to reduce all tariff rates by 5 per cent after July 1, 1932, and each fiscal year thereafter (H. R. 7713). Within two weeks, however, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH evidently changed his mind and introduced H. R. 8752 to do exactly the opposite and increase all tariff rates the exact amount that the foreign exchange had depreciated. Not only do we find this complete flip-flop from a "reduction" bill to an "increase" bill but we note that in his first bill he would have repealed the countervailing clauses, while in H. R. 8753 he would amend these clauses and provide strong penalties as well.

Mr. HOWARD, of Nebraska, wants the duties on table, household, and kitchen utensils reduced (H. R. 9488).

Mr. DIETERICH, of Illinois, wants no tariff charged on purchases of books and scientific instruments made by States or their agencies and institutions (H. R. 12480).

Mr. CELLER, of New York, wants to provide zones around certain cities on the coast and allow them to buy their products from foreign countries without paying any tariff and to manufacture articles for export shipment (H. R. 9206).

Mr. LEWIS, of Maryland, wants to amend the flexible provisions of the act and to provide against tariffs on articles of importation that are not the exact counterpart of the ones raised or manufactured here but are substitutes (H. R. 6747).

Mr. JOHNSON, of Texas, wants to issue debentures (H. R. 11892).

Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, acting chairman of the committee, wants to take from the free list the following imports from the Philippines and put on the regular and present rates: Coconut, cottonseed, and other oils, peanuts, and soybeans (H. R. 6391).

Mr. MARTIN, of Oregon, would prohibit the importation of products from countries using forced labor and agrees with Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH's last decision to raise all tariff rates the exact amount that the foreign exchange has depreciated from our gold exchange (H. R. 8550, H. R. 8564).

Mr. EVANS, of Montana, wants a tariff on copper (H. R. 266).

The following men want duties on oil: Mr. HASTINGS, of Oklahoma (H. R. 5710); Mr. DISNEY, of Oklahoma (H. R.

5658 and H. R. 8090); Mr. SANDERS, of Texas (H. R. 8018); Mr. AYERS, of Kansas (H. R. 8028).

Mr. HILL, of Washington, wants to increase all tariff rates the amount that exchanges have fallen from the gold exchange (H. R. 8640 and H. R. 8641).

Mr. SMITH, of West Virginia, wants a tariff on coal (H. R. 10029).

Mr. BOLAND, of Pennsylvania (do not forget, a Democrat), wanted a tariff of 15 cents per hundred pounds on coal, and succeeded in getting a tariff of 10 cents per 100 in the tax bill (H. R. 10053).

Mr. FULMER, of South Carolina, favors heavy duties on jute, jute butts, and waste bagging (now on free list), and increased rates on certain manufactures of jute (H. R. 1067).

Mr. VINSON, of Georgia, joins with many others in wanting to raise all tariffs by the amount of the depreciated exchanges (H. R. 10787).

Mr. MCKEOWN, our genial friend from Oklahoma, is against tariff (on general principles), but anxious to accept a tariff on Oklahoma's oil, if one properly interprets his bill (H. R. 10862).

Mr. HALL, of Mississippi, would prohibit imports from Russia (H. R. 11113).

Mr. DOUGLAS, of Arizona, introduced two resolutions for a tariff on copper. He succeeded in getting the Ways and Means Committee to allow a tariff at one time but it was stricken out before final action. The Senate later put it back in. (H. J. Res. 259 and 319.)

Mr. COLLIER, chairman of the great tariff-making committee of the House, at the instance of the "policy committee," a joint concoction of the Democrats of the House and Senate, attempted early in the session to offset the hue and cry from certain Democratic Members demanding tariff increases or new tariffs for the products of their individual States, introduced a bill to repeal the flexible tariff clauses and to hand over the making of our tariff policies to an economic conference of foreign nations (H. R. 6662). (This bill was fortunately vetoed by the President.)

And thus endeth the "tragedy of errors" of the Democratic majority in its attempt to keep its campaign pledges and reduce the tariff.

An epilogue is indeed fitting at this point in this story. The close of the session sees a Democratic majority, pledged in the beginning to a reduction of tariff rates, but finishing a run of six months without one serious attempt to make any reductions, and in the end actually passing a tax bill providing tariffs on oil, copper, lumber, and coal, none of which could have been placed there without the support and approval of Democrats.

THE COUNTRY IS DISGUSTED WITH CONGRESS—WHY?

Not one of the 435 Members of Congress but that has received hundreds of letters during the past few months in which have been expressed in no uncertain terms a growing disgust for "Congress." Furthermore, no reader of these letters, as well as no reader of editorial comment, can doubt that by "Congress" the people mean largely the "House of Representatives." Why is this true?

Not more than one year ago there was an almost universal respect for the House of Representatives. It was considered to be a body with some courage. It possessed the power and will to act. Throughout the entire world it was ranked as one of the most efficient of all parliamentary bodies. On the other hand, we know, in all frankness, that almost the opposite opinion was held of the Senate. Criticized from one end of the country to the other, it formed the best possible material for new anecdotes available to the platform or the press.

All of this was true until a few short months ago. Now the situation has been exactly reversed. No longer is the House of Representatives the "solid rock of our representative government, stable, sound, and dependable," and the Senate the "fly in the governmental ointment." Now the people voice doubt and disgust for the House of Representatives, while a growing respect for the Senate is noticeable. Why?

A purely partisan answer from a Republican might be, "The House is now controlled by the Democratic Party, while before it was controlled by Republicans." But I do not want to make a partisan answer. At least, I want to analyze the situation a little further.

What has the House of Representatives done to bring down the wrath of the people on its head? What are the "overt" acts that have turned a wholesome respect into an undoubted and oft-expressed disgust? Let us review the actions of the Seventy-second Congress and try to diagnose its ills and locate the defects that have brought forth this malady.

On December 7, 1931, Congress assembled. The Democrats had won the last elections, and therefore, organized the House. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] was chosen Speaker. Harmony was the watchword. Nonpartisanship was to guide every action. The country was pleased and greatly heartened and the House of Representatives was deeply appreciated and respected.

Speaker GARNER announced on December 7 that in a few days he would announce a Democratic legislation policy. The country liked Speaker GARNER. This promise of cooperation with the President was appreciated. Likewise his promise to present the legislative policy of the Democratic majority was highly approved. Still the country held the House in high esteem indeed.

President Hoover, on the promise of unity and cooperation, presented to Congress his reconstruction program. Partisanship was forgotten and with but minor fractions the measure was rushed through Congress and the greatest peace-time antidepression machinery ever tried was put into effective operation.

The country was pleased. The respectful thanks of the entire Nation was expressed in numerous ways. The Democratic majority was highly complimented for forgetting politics and working hand in hand with the President. The House still held the increasing respect and confidence of the country.

Next came the Glass-Steagall measure. Again party lines were forgotten in this emergency. Again the country was convinced that the House of Representatives was indeed a great patriotic and courageous body. Certainly up to this time the decomposition of the public faith in the House of Representatives had not begun.

Then came the deluge. What happened? Certainly since that time the respect for and the confidence of the people in Congress has been an ever-decreasing factor. It has now assumed the aspect of an avalanche of adverse sentiment. What pebble started this landslide?

Could it be that the entrance of the Speaker of the House [Mr. GARNER] upon a campaign for the Presidency had anything to do with it? Could it be that the statement of the Speaker, the leader of the Democratic Party in the House, to the effect that he would no longer cooperate with President Hoover have had anything to do with this sudden change in public sentiment?

Again let us review the public acts of Congress from this point on and try to diagnose the difficulty.

The tax measure was under consideration. All agreed that the most important duty of Congress was to "balance the Budget." The committee on which Speaker GARNER had served for more than a decade was engaged in writing the bill. On this committee were 15 Democrats and 10 Republicans. After days and nights of study and toil this committee brought in a bill. Supposedly, the Democratic leadership was solidly for it. While it did not please the President or the Republicans of the House, it was thought to be the best possible compromise, and it looked as if the bill would be quickly approved. However, at this point, a schism occurred in the ranks of the Democratic leaders. A cat and dog fight began which ended only when the bill was mutilated and marred beyond recognition. On the final vote it appeared that the only "followers" that great and stalwart leader, Mr. CRISP, of Georgia, had left were the Republicans who had agreed to forget partisanship and "balance the Budget" as quickly as possible.

As the tax measure gradually disintegrated, so likewise, did the Democratic leadership. The first to bolt the ranks was the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS, the chairman of the great Appropriations Committee. Steeped in figures that he never seemed to fully understand, he insisted that it was not necessary to "balance the Budget," anyhow.

From the time of Mr. BYRNS's departure, the exodus was rapid. Next followed that bold and intrepid, extemporaneous, partisan protector of democracy in all its consistencies and inconsistencies, Mr. BANKHEAD, of Alabama. The exodus continued until only CRISP, of Georgia, and the "greatest Roman of them all," RAINEY, of Illinois, were about the only ones left leading the fight for a nonpartisan balanced Budget measure. Of course, it was whispered about the corridors that Speaker GARNER was going to support the committee. At least, one great chain of newspapers so indicated to the world. On the floor of the House Members waited breathlessly for that great leader of the Democratic Party to speak on this subject and try to save his party from this disastrous rout. But Mr. GARNER never came to the floor during all this debate and it was not until three days after the fatal vote was taken that the country knew where he stood.

Too late to save his own committee's tax bill, but in order to answer the audible and ever-increasing roar of disapproval from the country, the Speaker, in dramatic style, asked each Member to arise if he would vote to "balance the Budget." All arose except Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee. Although this evidence of leadership came three days late, it served to give some reassurance to the country. No doubt, however, the present avalanche of disgust and distrust of Congress had its inception at the time the Democratic leadership went "hay wire" during the tax-bill fight.

Next came the economy measure. It was a vitally essential factor in the program of "balancing the Budget." The country had hopes it would be quickly passed. They had grounds for such hopes. Had not Speaker GARNER only a few days before secured a rising pledge from this House to "balance the Budget" at once? Again, however, the people were to be disillusioned. The Democratic leadership again split. Again Speaker GARNER failed to take the floor to lead his party and again the brave Democratic leaders who had the courage to stay and fight found only Republicans supporting them and the Democratic majority scurrying in all directions.

The landslide of disgust and despair of the ability of the House to function continued in an alarming fashion.

Then came the climax. As if to add the "capstone" to the edifice of fallen leadership, came the recent "pork barrel" post office bill, proposing the greatest "plunder" of the Public Treasury in our history. After having refused to bring in strict rules for consideration of the two great measures of the tax bill and the economy bill, the Democratic leadership brought in for this "pork barrel" bill the "gaggiest" gag rule of all time. It is hard to imagine such a rule. I do not believe the public, as angry as it is with Congress, will believe that such a rule would be considered. The rule provided among other things:

First. No one but Democrats could offer amendments.

Second. Any amendment offered by a Democratic member of the committee would be considered in order whether it was or not.

Imagine such a rule emanating from the party that has shouted from the housetops against "gag rule"!

In addition to the chronology of events as I have outlined, add the fact that the President has sent 22 messages to Congress urging early action to balance the Budget and reduce expenses. His messages have met with delay and inaction.

So I present to you the facts as they have occurred. A few short months ago our House was a highly respected, greatly esteemed body, known throughout the world as an effective and well-organized body. To-day it is used as an example of inaction, delay, and parliamentary chaos. Let the blame fall where it should. The Democratic Party has full charge of this House. On each committee it has a 20 per cent majority. As long as this Democratic leadership acted in a nonpartisan manner and cooperated with President Hoover, the House was held in high esteem, and likewise the Democratic Party in the House was justly admired. But when this leadership split and forgot harmony and unity there began a rapid disintegration of public respect and confidence in our House, until now it has reached the lowest ebb in history.

The country is disgusted with the House of Representatives. And justly so! But who is responsible for the antics of this House? The answer must be: The leaders who have charge are responsible and the people will hold the Democratic Party responsible for its leaders that failed to lead, as well as its membership who refused to follow responsible leadership.

Through all of this fog of partisanship and irresponsibility there has been one voice constantly calling for united effort and harmony; that was the voice of our great President, Herbert Hoover. Twenty-two times during this session he has appealed to Congress for early and harmonious action. Incessantly, through long days and sleepless nights, he has, with the aid of the greatest minds of the Nation, evolved a great program of reconstruction and presented it to Congress. He took help and advice wherever he could find it. Partisanship had no place in his program. Republicans and Democrats alike were called into conferences. His thanks and praise for speedy action were given without regard to party. No great leader has ever laid aside so completely personal and partisan preferment than has Herbert Hoover during these three trying years. He has met his responsibilities fearlessly, and with courage, constant hope, and lasting faith; he has given his country an unselfish and devoted leadership without which we too might have fallen into the maelstrom of world revolution that has destroyed many of the nations of the world during this greatest of all depressions.

Violent criticism of the President has been voiced on this floor and in many places in this Nation by the opposition. They state that he has been too optimistic, too hopeful. He is criticized for not having been able to foresee the severity and length of the economic storm that has struck the world and maintained its ferocity for a longer period than ever before in history. Let me quote the effective words of Hon. JAMES M. BECK, so aptly expressed on this subject:

> What has our President done to cause the violent criticism? The ship of state—when he took the helm—started out with clear skies and blue seas. Almost immediately it ran into possibly the most terrific and cyclonic storm of depression in our history, and certainly the greatest that can be recalled by the memory of living man. In those three years, under most trying circumstances, he has stood on the bridge, enveloped by a fog of misrepresentation, assailed by an icy sleet of bitter and partisan misrepresentation, never sparing himself, always on the bridge, by night and day, trying to steer the ship through the terrific gale in which it found itself; and all the thanks he gets, if we can judge from some of the speeches from the right side of the aisle, is that because, during those three years, he did not loudly claim that the ship was going down, that we were all doomed, therefore, he is to be criticized because the gale has lasted longer than anyone anticipated.

Never before has this country needed a stronger faith or a more determined courage than at this time of world-wide disaster. Herbert Hoover has been the embodiment of this faith and courage during these trying years, and the people of this country realize it and appreciate it.

ANTIKIDNAPING BILL

I am strongly in favor of passing an antikidnaping bill with teeth in it. I favor the provision providing for the death penalty or imprisonment as the court may inflict.

I see no reason to eliminate the death penalty. I feel that we have been too maudlin and soft in dealing with these heinous crimes. Too much soft speaking and too much sympathy has been extended the criminal organizations in this country. For this reason we have experienced a great growth of hoodlums and gangsters. I still believe that in the frontier days of the great West, the stronghearted frontiersmen had the best weapon against the criminal when they met "death with death." I would rather have the innocent life of one baby saved to this Nation than a thousand gangster criminals.

I urge my colleagues to keep in mind that we now make it a Federal offense to take an automobile across a State line. Likewise a theft of a can of tomatoes from an interstate carrier is a Federal crime. Then why this objection to making a Federal offense of kidnaping?

It is hard to understand why there should be opposition to this bill. Yet we have had no end of trouble in getting this bill out. For nearly six months it was allowed to lie dormant in committee. It was only when the great organizations of women of the country, such as the War Mothers of America, the parent-teacher associations, the auxiliaries of the war-service organizations, and so forth, took an interest that we were able to get this bill before the House.

Now, the only effective way a kidnaper can be dealt with is by making his crime a Federal offense. This is what the gangster and hoodlum fears. He does not fear his local officers, but he does fear Uncle Sam.

I urge you to vote for this bill. Let us get it on the statute books at once so as to put a stop to these activities of the kidnaper.

FARM RELIEF LEGISLATION—ITS STATUS, ITS NECESSITY, ITS DIFFICULTIES

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, a number of Congressmen, deeply interested and distressed over the agricultural situation, have been meeting to consider plans for its substantial relief. We have chosen Congressman SUMNERS of Texas, an able man who has devoted much thought to this subject, for chairman. While this may be termed a farm bloc, some of its most sincere members are from city districts. We believe that some legislation can and must be enacted which will rehabilitate the farmer and further believe that until such legislation is enacted there can be no prosperity for anybody. In our opinion, it is the paramount problem before the country, and upon its solution depends the welfare of all our people. We are determined to put this first thing first from now on.

We regret that we have been unable to accomplish any real benefits during this session of Congress. We have delayed through following the program of the President and other so-called experts, who insisted from the beginning of the session that relief would be forthcoming from their proposals.

Congress has been in session now for six months. We have passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, the Glass-Steagall banking bill, additional tariffs and subsidies, and yet we find conditions worse now than when we met. The farmers' dollar was 55.2 per cent in December and 49.6 per cent in May, and still lower now.

The trouble with all such legislation is that it is applied at the wrong end. Its design was to begin at the top and let its benefits trickle down to the farmers and people generally, but sound conditions do not result through trickling down. They must come by permeating up. For the leaves of the tree to be green, nourishment must be applied at the roots. Industry should now be convinced that it can not prosper upon a ruined agriculture.

The farmer has here as elsewhere many friends who render him lip service. They sincerely believe they are friendly to him yet will not resist the efforts of special privilege when it seeks an advantage over him. Voting to relieve the big tobacco companies of taxes paid on manufactured tobacco and to relieve the big power companies of taxes upon electricity used on the farm and such second-hand gratuities, if sound, are so trival for agricultural relief as to be a profound farce.

At the December session real friends of the farmer will have an opportunity to go deep into the fundamental causes which have resulted in his collapse. Such a program is now in the making.

After a thorough investigation and consultation with the organization and leaders in this field of legislation, we frankly admit that until after the election nothing can be accomplished. In private conversation leaders and Members admit the general truths herein set out but show an apprehension to attempt now the far-reaching character of relief necessary.

To give agriculture permanent and lasting relief naturally will require a rise in commodity prices in greater proportion than a rise in manufactured articles, or, as aptly stated the other day, to a point where what the farm has to sell will buy more of what the city has to sell. This may require a long period of readjustment.

The farmer has, in addition to this, an immediate problem, which is his indebtedness. We all went in debt. For the last 10 years it has been the policy of private business and of the Government to make it easy to go into debt. We were encouraged to go in debt, believing, and having a right to believe, that we would be permitted to pay the indebtedness with the same amount of products required at the time we incurred the indebtedness. Now those who control the currency of this country, those high and mighty in dominating its finances through a policy of deflation upon an arbitrary fiat, those who hold our mortgages, now demand of us two and three times as many hogs and as many bushels of wheat and as many pounds of tobacco and as many head of cattle and as many gallons of milk and as many pounds of butter as would have been required to have paid them when that indebtedness was made.

The farmer must be relieved from this withering indebtedness. His mortgages must be refinanced at a rate of interest not greater than 3 per cent. As the farmer gets little or no relief from a tariff, he is entitled to governmental help in low interest. This can be done and must be done. At that rate the farmer could pay out, or at least hold on until the readjustment can be made.

A great majority of the farm mortgages are held either by the Federal land banks or the joint-stock land banks or the insurance companies and mortgage companies. The holders of these mortgages would gladly refinance them if stabilized by the Government at 75 per cent of the face value.

The Government could protect those mortgages in all prudent loans and its security would be better than the security taken upon the loans made through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to railroads and other industries.

I am opposed to the further loaning of new money. The farmer who is out of debt is in good shape and should be encouraged to keep out rather than go in debt. This farm-relief legislation consisting in further extension of credit is unwise. We have gone too far this way already. A loan at high interest is a liability.

Legislation along these lines is imperative, and when Congress reconvenes in December I look for this to be given first consideration.

Mr. SANDLIN, of Louisiana, and I were put on the committee to draft and submit a bill covering this phase of the legislation. I have added Mr. CARY, of Kentucky, an able man of farming and banking experience, to that committee.

We have been in consultation with the Federal Farm Loan Board. They promise to aid in preventing any unnecessary foreclosures.

We will discuss the matter this summer with farmers and other business men generally and we hope to submit a bill at the fall session, embodying a sound policy of substantial relief.

We ask the serious consideration and help of every Member of Congress for this important legislation.

The Government has, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, given its credit to banks, railroads, and industrial corporations. It has through the home loan discount bill given its credit to city home owners and it must in justice to and for its own preservation help worthy farmers to retain their farms.

Princes and lords may flourish or may fade,
A breath can make them as a breath has made,
But a bold peasantry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INVESTIGATE CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES

Pursuant to House Resolution 201, the Speaker appointed the following Members as a special committee to investigate campaign expenditures: Mr. RAGON, Mr. BLACK, Mr. HARLAN, Mr. LEHLBACH, and Mr. NELSON of Maine.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, Mr. DOUGLASS of Massachusetts was given leave of absence for 10 days on account of important business.

SAMUEL PUFF BAILEY

The SPEAKER. By special order of the House, the Private Calendar is in order for bills unobjected to, beginning at Calendar No. 393.

The Clerk read the first bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 5289, for the relief of Samuel Puff Bailey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Reserving the right to object, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes out of order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, at the present time there are several thousand bonus marchers in this city. The living conditions are intolerable—no food, clothing, or shelter. These men can not stand this existence for long, and something definite should be suggested that might appeal to them for their own help.

There is a way to get these men home. General Glassford at the present time is making a brief survey of the number of men and where they come from. Under the interstate commerce act these men can not be transported for less than 1 cent a mile, with the following exception, in section 1, paragraph 7:

If any group of people are indigent, destitute and homeless the railroad is allowed to transport them for anything reasonable or anything they desire. Can you imagine any groups more indigent, destitute, and homeless than these unfortunate men? Under a ruling of the Interstate Commerce Commission a train, or a series of trains, could leave here for all parts of the country carrying day coaches that could be dropped off at various points. There is no question but that these men could be taken home in this manner for a comparative small amount of money. The city of Omaha will raise the money to send back the 54 men who come from my own district.

These men are orderly, peaceful, and patriotic, and have shown remarkable fortitude in very trying circumstances. There is a small group inside the organization that are trying to overthrow the present leaders. This would be disastrous, as the present leaders are certainly for law and order. The sooner we solve this problem the better for all.

There will be placed in your office a mimeographed copy of the number of men from each district; and if any of you gentlemen are interested in helping take care of this situation, I think this is the best possible way to get your own men back home.

We have had a good many suggestions and a great deal of advice to these men, not only from the floor of the House but from the steps in front of the Capitol, all of which I think was ill-advised, unfortunate, and certainly unfounded. Here is one way to help this group—get them home and get them home quickly and as comfortably as possible.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know that they will go home if provision is made for it?

Mr. BALDRIGE. From what I understand, there is a general feeling that within a few days most of these men will be anxious and ready to go back home if they possibly can get home.

Mr. BLACK. In the gentleman's plan, what part is the Government supposed to take?

Mr. BALDRIGE. No part at all. We might arrive at an understanding with the railroads, with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to transport these men back home at a very cheap rate.

General Glassford is in close contact with them. He could ably handle the details through his office as a clearing house.

If you gentlemen who are interested in men from your own districts could get your local newspapers to put on a short financial drive for funds, enough money could be raised. It should be definitely announced that no transportation assistance would be given after a certain date, so that any further incoming bonus marchers may be put on notice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of H. R. 5289?

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged sailors Samuel Puff Bailey, late of the United States Marine Corps, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Marine Corps: Provided, That no pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 6, strike out the word "honorably," and in line 7, after the word "discharged," insert the words "under honorable conditions."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

JACK C. RICHARDSON

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8120) for the relief of Jack C. Richardson.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Lieut. Jack C. Richardson, United States Navy, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $143.04, in full satisfaction of his claim for expenses incurred while traveling around the world on the German airship Graf Zeppelin under orders of August 5, 1929, issued by the Navy Department.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PERMITTING NAVY AND MARINE CORPS OFFICERS TO ACCEPT CERTAIN DECORATIONS, ETC.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8970) to authorize certain officers of the United States Navy and Marine Corps to accept such decorations, orders, and medals as have been tendered them by foreign governments in appreciation of services rendered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object and ask unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLACK. I shall object to 10 minutes, but not to 5 minutes.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Very well.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York, under reservation of the right to object to the consideration of the bill, asks unanimous consent to address the House for not exceeding five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Mr. Speaker, I am very much interested in the situation existing here in Washington, which has been somewhat outlined by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BALDRIGE]. We are in the closing moments of the session, and I want to speak frankly. I am one of those who voted against the bonus, for two definite reasons. First, I do not figure that the country under present financial conditions is able to pay the bonus, and, secondly, I am in favor of relief for all of the unemployed. I intend to vote for a relief bill which will give employment and favor veterans in such employment.

A great many of these veterans here in Washington have been in France. There is one thing that is absolutely true,

I contend, and that is you can not pay a bonus if you have not got and can not get the money, and you can not issue rations in the front line, which to-day is Washington, if some one is blocking those rations and has been blocking them for 13 years. By rations I mean money. Statistics by Matthew Woll, of the American Federation of Labor, which I have not time to quote from, show that prohibition has cost this Government at least $25,000,000,000, and I want now to recall the record of the votes of Representatives from several States on the Beck-Linthicum resolution.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is no time to be debating about liquor and prohibition, and that the gentleman is supposed to confine his remarks to the bill.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Mississippi is out of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York obtained unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes, and has been recognized for five minutes to speak on any subject he desires to talk about.

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. Representatives of the bonus marchers have gone on record, with some disagreement, in favor of repealing the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and I want every man in that outfit to know how Representatives from certain States voted in this session of Congress on a proposition which would have permitted the people to decide. I have the Texas vote, corrected up to date—14 no, 4 yes; Oklahoma, 8 no; Mississippi, 6 no; Alabama, 9 no and 1 yes; Tennessee, 9 no and 1 yes; Louisiana, 4 no and 4 yes; South Carolina, 6 no and 1 yes; North Carolina, 8 no and 1 yes; Kentucky, 3 no and 1 yes, 7 not voting.

Mr. BLACK. Are those the votes of the Republican delegation from the South at the Chicago convention?

Mr. ANDREWS of New York. No. If I were able to give some suggestion to these marchers, I would say go back to your Congressmen and ask for reconsideration of the Beck-Linthicum resolution. Go to your State legislators and to your State capitols. Repeal the eighteenth amendment. It will make jobs. It will bring the rations into the front line, which is our Treasury.

The Republican platform, at least, declares for resubmission, and the Democratic platform will declare at least for resubmission. What is there to prevent our conforming now before we adjourn and not waiting six months more? This will make it possible for the Government to get money from taxation. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, the House has before it for consideration every year or so this proposition of foreign decorations. Of course under present conditions, for instance, when a country is at war with other countries, the exchange of decorations for heroism, exceptional conduct in the face of the enemy, is bestowed on individuals as a matter of morale and appreciation of services. Most of these decorations are 5 o'clock tea decorations. I do not believe there is a single, solitary decoration here for conspicuous military service or for any kind of conspicuous service at all. If there is, of course I eliminate that particular decoration from my general remarks.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman means 5 o'clock pink-tea decorations?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes. Petticoat decorations.

Mr. COYLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. COYLE. There might be some few decorations that might fall in that category, but there are many for military valor. There are some from Nicaragua and some from Haiti.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I want to make clear that I am excluding from my criticism decorations received for valor. Let us understand each other. But to come in with this bill to authorize swivel-chair admirals and roll-top-desk naval officers, whose duties seem to be in dancing attendance at social functions, to accept in the name of a great democracy these petticoat decorations—I do not like it.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. PATTERSON. The gentleman said he excepted those for distinguished service and valor. Of course, the gentleman excepts this one in this case, I am sure, because this man and a few men went out——

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Oh, there are over a hundred of them.

Mr. PATTERSON. Is this 395?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No, no. This is a wholesale decoration. This is the cotillion bunch. These are the cotillion favorites. However, if the Navy can stand it, I can.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I question very much the propriety of the American Government granting the right to American officers to take decorations from foreign governments. It is simply a means of gaining the favor of those officers to the foreign government. I think it is un-American. I do not believe it should be countenanced. Therefore, I object, Mr. Speaker.

HARDING TOWNSITE, FLA.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2476, for the relief of certain purchasers of lots in Harding Townsite, Fla.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. WOODRUM. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will withhold the objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is to require the Government to return half the purchase price they have collected from certain persons who purchased these lots in Harding Townsite, Fla. In 1922 the Government put on a sale of lots down in Florida, at the time of the boom, and advertised them as a new town-site development. The lots were appraised at $1,000 each by the Government. Some of them sold for as high as $10,000, and many of the purchasers paid a third or a half of the purchase price. After the sale it developed that the Government could not deliver title. It would be at least five years before the Government could deliver title. Meantime, the value had depreciated; the bottom had dropped out of everything. If this bill is passed the Government will still retain five or six times the appraised value of the lots.

Mr. STAFFORD. Does the gentleman mean the appraised value at the present time?

Mr. WOODRUM. No. At the time they sold them. When the Government released this property and put the property on the market, it was appraised.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over temporarily.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

PUBLIC SERVICES OF HON. PERCY QUIN AND HON. JOHN J. SWAIN

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement concerning two chairmen of the Committee on Military Affairs with whom I have served.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, just as a man grows reminiscent as he grows older, so, as we approach the end of a session of Congress, we are apt to look backward upon the pleasant associations we have had with picked men from all over the country. During such a mood the mind irresistibly turns to the memory of those who have passed from the scene of earthly action. During my service in this House, many faithful public servants and loyal citizens have dropped at their posts of duty, facing to the front, full of faith, and fighting till the last.

I refrain from enumerating all of these noble souls that have contributed during these years to the enrichment of my experience. But there is one whose name I must mention now. With him I served upon the Committee on Military Affairs for many years. During all those years we sat side by side, seeking to promote the public welfare and to secure a sane, sound system of national defense. This was the man beloved by every Member of the House. It was Percy Quin, of Mississippi.

After all those many years of service upon the committee he became chairman, upon the organization of the House, in December, 1931. He entered upon the discharge of this responsible office with great enthusiasm and zeal. He was fired by the inspiration of the great opportunity for service, and especially for service to the people of his section of the country, by the proper solution of the long-standing and perplexing problem of Muscle Shoals.

But the severity of the strain, both mental and physical, was too much for his strength, already worn down by the long years of labor. Consequently, he was forced to the hospital, where he finally passed to his blessed reward on February 4, 1932.

I record my tribute of admiration and devotion to this faithful friend of the people and this loyal servant of the Republic.

Mr. Speaker, thinking of Percy Quin, my mind turns to his successor as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I know that it has been a source of gratification to the Members of this House to witness the return to health of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. McSWAIN] after a long and serious illness last summer, and to see the splendid part he has played in the deliberations and the actions of the House of Representatives at this session. We recall that it was an amendment offered by him to the War Department appropriations bill and adopted by this House that would make possible an annual saving to the Federal Treasury of about $4,000,000.

We recall that as chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs he directed the passage through this House of the bill to correct abuses in the Veterans' Administration and to make possible a saving to the Federal Treasury of $3,500,000 a year. It was he who a few weeks ago directed in this body the passage of the Muscle Shoals bill, which should put an end to the waste at that great project, bring millions of dollars into the Federal Treasury, and give relief to the farmers and the power consumers of the land. It was largely due to his pioneering work and his untiring efforts that this House has before it to-day the report of the War Policies Commission, of which the Secretary of War was chairman and he an honored member. This report opens the way for Congress to enact legislation that will eliminate the War profiteer and close the door to those who would profit from the sufferings and the heartaches of the people.

For eight years it was my privilege to serve side by side with the gentleman from South Carolina on the Committee on Military Affairs. He brought to the committee wide knowledge and experience, gleaned from a lifetime of study and work as a lawyer and man of affairs. He was ever attentive to duty, was at every meeting, ever vigilant, ever wise, and ever resourceful. During all of that period he contributed mightily to the work of the committee, and was ever alert to conserve and protect the interest of the Government and the people. I recall on one occasion he offered an amendment about two lines long to an apparently harmless bill, and thereby saved the Government some $280,000. He always evinced a deep and abiding interest in the citizen soldiery of the country, the National Guard and the reserves, recognizing that in them could be found that patriotism and that devotion to our Democratic ideals which in the days of peace, as well as in the time of war, would protect and defend our institutions. Especially was he always wide awake to protect and promote the welfare and comfort of the enlisted men of the Army.

This gentleman is now the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. As chairman of this great and powerful committee, Mr. McSWAIN is one of the key men of the Congress, and opportunity is thus given him for even greater and more enduring service to the country. In spite of the fact that this committee has before it more bills than any other committee in the House of Representatives, with the exception of two committees—Pensions and Claims—and notwithstanding the great amount of hard work required, Mr. McSWAIN has contributed his part to the solution of other great questions before the Congress. If his bill for refinancing the Federal farm land banks and the joint stock land banks had become law, thousands of farmers and their families would not have been driven off of their land. He has been a constructive student of the farmer's problems, and in Mr. McSWAIN the farmers certainly have a true and active friend. The unemployment situation and the condition of the men and women who toil in the factories and the workshops has weighed heavily upon his heart. He has labored unceasingly to bring about better conditions and to make it possible for all who labor to receive adequate wages, to have decent homes, to educate their children, and to have at least some of the comforts and the joys of life. The gentleman from South Carolina is surely an able and a devoted servant of the people. No sort of lobby, social or otherwise, can influence him to act against the public interest.

WORK OF THE HOUSE DURING THE PRESENT SESSION

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, as the close of the first session of the Seventy-second Congress draws near, I desire to express my pride and satisfaction over the success of the House of Representatives in meeting the needs of the people of this country in this period of great economic stress.

When the session opened last December, I knew that in securing control of the House the Democratic Party was entering upon a responsibility probably as grave as any that ever confronted a Congress. I realized that the eyes of an anxious nation were upon us; that the people of the country had turned to the Democratic Party.

I realized, too, that as a party, unless we acquitted ourselves with credit during this session, we faced the danger of courting defeat in the presidential election now approaching.

While there never was any doubt in my mind that we could meet this tremendous responsibility squarely, I confess that I did have certain misgivings. I was supremely confident that we would fulfill our obligation, but I was mildly fearful that regardless of all that we might accomplish, the people would expect more. They were at the end of their patience with the Republican Party, and it was just possible that they expected the Democratic Party to take a situation that had been three years or more in the making and right it in a few months, as if by some supernatural power.

Now the session is practically over; and as one who has participated in these deliberations over a period of six months, with the sole purpose in mind of aiding the suffering people of this Nation, I am ready to pronounce the verdict of "well done" on this House of Representatives.

I am not unmindful of the fact that we have been subjected to abuse and criticism, but, then, that is the lot of every man and woman who lends himself and herself to public service. Fair criticism is not disconcerting—yes; many of us find it helpful. To criticize justly is the free and undeniable privilege of everyone under our form of government, and I may even add, though with some regret, that the same has come to be true of unjust criticism and even downright abuse.

But there are those to whom the rôle of critic comes with ill grace. The person who has shown himself incapable of doing anything himself has not the right to ostentatiously place the label of failure on others. The individual who throws obstacles in the way of those attempting to accomplish something should be the last one to find fault. And yet that is the thanks that this House has received for its efforts—a public excoriation—by those least licensed.

But I say that in spite of the handicaps under which we have labored we have discharged our duty.

If political expediency decrees that our reward shall be vilification from high places, there is nothing we can do about it but point to the record. I prefer to rely on the record. Even if, in the judgment of some, we have not done all that we might have done, I say it still compares most favorably with the records of the three preceding Congresses.

Prior to the opening of the present session last December, the Democratic leaders pledged the people of the United States that the majority in the House would cooperate with the President in any undertaking that seemed designed to hasten economic recovery. We came here under the solemn obligation to cast partisanship aside, cognizant as we were of the need for concerted action for the good of the Nation.

Recently we have been charged with having broken that pledge. We have been accused of failing to cooperate with the President. Actually the situation has been the reverse. We have had to tax our patience in order that we might extend our cooperation to the administration. We have had to put up with administration whims and fancies and we have had to endure being misled and misinformed. But we did not complain.

What, may I ask, were we requested to do by the administration that we failed to do? The President expressed the desire to have a one year's moratorium declared on foreign debts; we granted it. Then he proposed the creation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and we immediately did that. The President next asked that he be given the power to reorganize the Federal departments along lines of economy, and we lost no time in vesting him with that power.

He also suggested the enactment of legislation providing for the establishment of a system of home-loan banks. This legislation was considered diligently by the Committee on Banking and Currency, the bill was rewritten by the committee, was reported on favorably, and passed by the House under a special rule.

Thus have we supported the proposals placed before us by the President.

In his annual Budget message to Congress, the President stressed the great need for reducing the cost of Government. His Budget recommendations called for a reduction in appropriations for the next fiscal year of $369,000,000, and he pointed out that of total appropriations of $3,942,000,000, as recommended by him, there remained but $1,700,000,000 from which the $369,000,000 could be taken.

All the while our Appropriations Committee was considering appropriations it was handicapped by the constant lobbying of department heads and other administration members seeking to prevent the lopping off of a single dollar from their appropriations. And yet, after we had finished, we sent to the Senate appropriation bills showing a total saving under last year's bills of more than $625,000,000, or $254,000,000 more than the President recommended. That, I submit, was economy with a vengeance.

We received no aid from the White House in this work. We were not even granted the cooperation of having the President call off the administration lobbyists so that our Appropriations Committee could work unhampered. In addition, throughout the entire time that we were considering the revenue program, we had to contend with inefficient fiscal experts representing the administration, who would come to our committee each day with revised figures.

Did I say the President refused to call off the administration lobbyists, who swarmed around the Appropriations and other committees? On the contrary, he sent one of his own secretaries, a former Member of this body, onto the floor of this House to lobby against certain provisions of the economy bill; and when they were defeated—not by the Democratic majority but by the Members on the Republican side, whom the President's Secretary had instructed to vote against these provisions—the President issued a statement denouncing the Members of this House for the form in which the bill passed.

While the Democratic Party has been in nominal control of the House, the only purpose it served was to enable us to organize this branch of Congress. We have never had a safe working majority; and because of absences and illness, we have had invariably to depend upon Republican aid. The people of the United States may well be thankful for the fact that there sat as Members of the House during this session progressive and independent Republicans with sufficient vision to see what was going on—to see that administration duplicity was impeding us.

These Republicans were strong enough, big enough, to break away from the sinister influences that were put to work to injure the Democratic majority, regardless of the fact that it was necessary first to stab the people of this country before the weapon's point could reach us. And these Republicans refused to sacrifice the suffering men, women, and children of this country to play the brand of politics ordained by their party leaders.

Throughout this session the attitude of the administration and its followers in the House has been that of the dog in the manger. Having failed the people of the country themselves, they sought to prevent the Democratic majority in the House from doing anything, taking advantage of our scant numerical majority.

Oh, it was a well-planned campaign. The object was from the very outset to discredit the Democratic Party, with the hope that it might lessen the chances for Democratic success in the presidential election. Advocating to us something on the one hand, the administration, on the other, would send word out to defeat it; and then the blame would be thrown on the Democratic Party because we happened to have a slight majority here.

"Balance the Budget." This became a slogan in Congress. Nobody had heard of such a thing in 1931, 1930, and 1929, or as far back as most of us can remember. Before the Democratic Party came into control of the House Treasury deficits were glossed over by the issuance of Treasury certificates or Treasury notes, one issue after another, resulting in an accumulation of interest and amortization obligations that greatly reduced the opportunities for retrenchment this year. But with the Democratic Party in control of the House it suddenly dawned upon the administration that the Budget had to be balanced, and it had to be done without issuing any more Treasury certificates. The shibboleth of despair and alarm swept across the country, "Balance the Budget." They thought we could not do it.

Not only that, but it was indeed a day lost when the Secretary of the Treasury failed to add millions to his estimates of the previous day of the amount of revenue needed to balance the Budget. Mr. Mellon started it; and when he finally set sail for England, it was discovered that he had been a billion dollars out of the way in his estimates.

His successor, Mr. Mills, would knock at our doors every morning for months and months and tell us that he had made another miscalculation, and that the amount actually needed was many millions more. This went on for days, weeks, and months, and just as we would set ourselves to provide for the deficit on the basis of to-day's estimate, tomorrow would bring a new set of figures from the Treasury Department, and we would have to start all over again.

But our revenue bill, as forwarded to the Senate on April 1, 1932, would have balanced the Budget on July 1, 1933, if the figures finally furnished us had been accurate. But Mr. Mills continued his antics even after the bill reached the Senate, and the upper House had to put up with him for a while. On June 6, 1932, when the revenue bill was signed by the President, it was announced that the Budget is balanced—the first time in 12 years. However, on June 11, 1932, after a further revision of figures by Mr. Mills, the White House called a conference, at which it was once more stated that there was something wrong; that the Budget was still $150,000,000 out of balance. I believe the last 48 hours have brought no change in the Treasury estimates.

Among the many unfair impressions that were deliberately sent broadcast against the House in the organized partisan campaign to turn public favor from us was that in which we were pictured as frittering away our time here, thus contributing to the general economic uncertainty. I am willing to charge that we could have concluded our business a month ago if we had had better cooperation, or some cooperation at least, from the administration in the matters of the appropriations, economy, and revenue bills.

It might not even be amiss to remind our critic that if sincerity motivated his publicly stated disgust with the protracted session of Congress, he should have directed his remarks elsewhere. I say this for this reason:

The House passed the first deficiency appropriation bill on January 6; it was not until 13 days later that the upper House passed it. The House passed the Agricultural Department appropriation bill on January 27; the Senate passed it on March 8. We passed the Interior Department appropriation bill on February 16; the Senate passed it two months later. The appropriations bill for the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments went through the House on February 25; it was passed by the Senate on April 30.

The House passed the Treasury and Post Office appropriation bill on March 5. It still reposes in Senate committee. We passed the appropriation bill for the independent offices on April 9, and the Senate committee reported it out on June 10. The appropriation bill for the District of Columbia, passed by us on April 15, passed the Senate on June 11. The Navy Department appropriation bill was passed by us on April 28 and by the Senate on June 16. The War Department appropriation bill, passed by us on May 19, passed the Senate on June 9. On May 3 we passed the legislative appropriation bill, and the Senate passed it on June 8.

The amendment to the tariff act of 1930 was passed in the House on January 9; it passed the Senate on April 1, almost three months later. The revenue bill passed here on April 1 and passed the Senate exactly two months later. In this latter connection I might again allude to the Secretary of the Treasury. At the very moment the Senate was ready to pass the revenue bill Mr. Mills again suddenly revised his estimates, adding more than $200,000,000 to his figures, making it necessary for the Senate to commence all over again.

I ask, then, can we be blamed for the fact that we have been here so long? Have not we worked day and night? I say that it was eminently unfair to circulate erroneous impressions that the House has been dilatory. The blame should be placed where it rightfully belongs.

I am anxious to know what potent magic has over a period of a few years turned venison to pork.

Not so very long ago, in practically every utterance that emanated from the White House, we were sought to be impressed with the efficacy of a Federal construction program as a panacea for the unemployment situation. Economists the country over were in agreement on the matter. The American Federation of Labor hailed the proposal. The Post Office Department, the Treasury Department, and the Board of Engineers indorsed it. As a matter of fact, the construction program was initiated, and then something happened. The work was halted, and to-day we have the most acute unemployment crisis in our history.

Economists still agree that a program of public improvement is the great need in dealing with the situation. The American Federation of Labor has not changed its opinion. Only the administration has suddenly had a revulsion of feeling, and now, because the Democratic Party, in common with those chiefly concerned with the salutary benefits that will accrue, is attempting to revive the program, the original proponents raise the cry of "pork barrel."

If it was not pork two years ago, what has happened to make it pork now? Two years ago a Federal construction program was the open sesame to the road back to prosperity. We make no such extravagant claims for it. But, we do feel, and as I have said, we are not alone in our opinion, that it will materially help to reduce the number of our idle and increase industrial production. And yet we must suffer the insult of being accused of trying to graft at the expense of human misery.

Opponents of the Garner program shout that it will unbalance the Budget. They have taken up a new White House cry—"self-liquidating projects." The Garner program has absolutely no relation whatever to the Budget. The Garner program—and it is as plain as day to anyone who wants to see it—provides that not a penny is to be expended without the sanction of the Treasury and Post Office Departments. The fixed charges for the retirement of any bonds to be issued are provided for by a sinking fund to be set up by a tax of one-fourth of 1 cent a gallon on gasoline, the tax not to be passed on to the consumer.

In conformity with its constant shifting of ideas to meet the present situation—and, mind you, all the while this shifting goes on the suffering of the people becomes worse—the administration now sponsors a program of self-liquidating projects. I challenge anyone to name a single self-liquidating project that would fit into such a program. The only ones I have heard mentioned are tunnels and bridges, and I presume to speak with authority when I say that even they are nonexistent at the present moment.

I come from a State that has had vast experience with tunnels and bridges. During the past decade we have built in the northern part of New Jersey, connecting with New York, five interstate crossings, four of them bridges and a tunnel. Of the five, only one has ever been self-supporting—the Holland Tunnel—and but for the fact that the State legislature last year placed all the crossings under one jurisdiction, I dare say it might have been necessary to default on the bridge bonds. As it is, the Holland Tunnel is carrying the bridges.

The Port of New York Authority last year contemplated the construction of another interstate tunnel, but due to present conditions the project has been postponed. That is the answer to self-liquidating projects, and those who now propose a program embodying such type of construction are well aware of the fact. The time for creating newspaper headlines is past; we must settle down to sensible action.

The House may well feel proud of its Speaker as the sponsor of the Federal construction program and of its action in supporting that program. It is the one outstanding practical remedy for ameliorating the unemployment situation.

In listing the accomplishments of this body in its struggles with the various phases of the economic situation, I desire to call particular attention to the Glass-Steagall Act. This is purely Democratic legislation, and I sincerely believe that its results in expanding credit facilities have been proportionately as beneficial as has the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which, I might say in passing, had its genesis in the Democratic Party. At least, the Glass-Steagall Act has proved an excellent auxiliary to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, and it should serve to demonstrate to the people of this country that the Democratic Party is quite capable of evolving its own particular remedies for the country's ills. As for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation legislation, I need not remind you gentlemen who were here at the time, that it was first proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] two years ago but was rejected by the Republican administration.

The latest move initiated by the Democratic side of this House bids fair to put a stop to a condition that has progressively dealt severe injury to business, large and small, in many parts of the country. I refer to the investigation authorized in the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON] into the question of Government competition with private enterprise—industrial as well as commercial.

In times like these when it becomes necessary not to overlook a single opportunity to extend courage and assistance to business and industry, the Shannon investigation is most appropriate and urgent. Evidence has already been offered to show that the Federal Government as a manufacturing concern is not only taking business from private firms but is supplying its own needs at a much greater cost than if it went into the open market as a purchaser. When we speak of economy, we must consider this angle of costs.

Evidence is also on record showing that the Government, in some sections of the country, is competing with small retail business, a condition that should not exist. Business will appreciate this effort on the part of the House.

I have tried, in this résumé of what we have accomplished here, to touch only upon the major questions and those related to the paramount subject of what to do about the depression.

We came here under the tremendous handicap of being expected, as a new party in control, to cure the country's ills of three years overnight. At the same time that we were trying to cooperate with the administration we have had to contend not only with an absence of reciprocal cooperation but with deliberate efforts to block us.

Throughout this entire session we have had to fight an organized, insidious, and underhanded campaign against us on the part of those with whom we were trying to work on amicable and nonpartisan terms. And yet, in six months of dealing under these adverse conditions with a situation that it took the Republican Party three years to create, we have balanced the Budget—the first time this has been done in more than a decade. We have cut governmental appropriations to a new low level; we have effected vast economies in the operation of the Government; and we have enacted measures that have saved our banks, encouraged business and industry, and provided work for the unemployed.

These are the facts, substantiated by the record of this House; and whether he be President of the United States or anyone else, I say in answer to the criticism leveled at us, What have you or yours done with the same opportunities?

MARION F. BLACKWELL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9714, for the relief of Marion F. Blackwell.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, on certification by the Secretary of the Interior, be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Marion F. Blackwell, of Laurel, Miss., such sum, not to exceed $1,000, as may be found by the Secretary of the Interior to be the fair and reasonable value of all improvements placed by said Blackwell upon the southeast quarter southwest quarter section 27, township 2 south, range 6 west, St. Stephens meridian, Mississippi, for which land he was allowed to make homestead entry No. 05823, Jackson series, on October 1, 1912, and on September 20, 1916, a patent was issued to him, but on February 20, 1917, the United States District Court for the Southern District of Mississippi decreed that the titled and rightful claim to the land was vested prior to the patent to Blackwell in the Lampton Realty Co., thus defeating Blackwell's claim. It is further provided that he may have the option in lieu of payment to him of moneys hereinbefore provided of making entry of other unappropriated public lands to the amount of 160 acres under the general homestead law or 320 acres under the enlarged homestead law or 640 acres under the stock raising homestead law anywhere in the United States where there are public lands subject to such entry and receiving United States patent for such land without payment to the United States of any fees, commissions, or other moneys and without showing of compliance with the requirements of the homestead laws in connection therewith, the patent, however, to contain a reservation of the mineral to the United States, if necessary, as in other entries under the same law.

With the following committee amendments:

On page 1, line 10, after the word "Mississippi," insert "the appropriation of which is hereby authorized"; and in line 10 on page 2, after the word "option," insert "at any time within three years."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONTRACTORS AND SUBCONTRACTORS FOR POST OFFICES, ETC.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9348, to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post office and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BURCH. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. I reserve the objection.

Mr. BURCH. The gentleman understands that this bill does not provide for direct reimbursement, but only to allow Haymes Bros. to file their claim with the Treasury Department. This would give them the same privilege given under the general law of 1919. These men had no other contract with the Government, and in the latter part of 1917, as the Members will recall, conditions in the country were more or less depressed. In 1918 they had to employ labor and buy material, and it was impossible for these contractors to carry out that contract without loss to them on account of governmental activities, commandeering material, and labor, increasing the cost of building generally. These conditions which the contractors had to face were such that no contractor could foresee.

We are asking that they be allowed to file their claim with the Treasury Department and permission for the Treasury Department to ascertain and decide whether they really have a claim; and if so, how much. If these people had other contracts, we would not ask for this.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask the gentleman if these people have had the right, and if others have had the right, to file claims where they lost money in a building they contracted for?

Mr. UNDERHILL. They had it under the Dent law.

Mr. BURCH. Under the general law they did not. They did not come under the act of 1919, amended 1920.

Mr. UNDERHILL. They had that right under the Dent law, but failed to take advantage of it.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. This is hardly the right thing to do. These contractors knew what the law was. They only had to file under the Dent Act. They failed to do so. Ignorance of the law is no excuse on their part, and because their lawyer or somebody in the firm failed to take advantage of the vehicle which was provided is no reason why they should come in at this day and ask for special relief.

Mr. BURCH. Pardon me. I think this claim did not come within the bounds of the general law. This man's contract was made November 27, 1917, and relief is sought because for some reason the contractor did not come under the general law.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is my judgment that if we let this thing go through there will be many, many others seeking the same character of relief.

Mr. Speaker, I object.

R. A. HUNSINGER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4845, for the relief of R. A. Hunsinger.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RELIEF OF CONTRACTORS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9348, to amend the act entitled "An act for the relief of contractors and subcontractors for the post office and other buildings and work under the supervision of the Treasury Department, and for other purposes," approved August 25, 1919, as amended by act of March 6, 1920.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I reserve the right to object on this bill in order that I may give a little information to the House in reference to claims bills in general.

I have noticed two or three statements in the RECORD which were more or less misinforming to the Members.

Under the provisions of the so-called Underhill small claims act all of the departments are authorized to settle claims of property damage up to $1,000. The gentleman from Wisconsin made an error the other day in stating that such a law was invalid. It is only invalid as far as personal injury is concerned, but as far as property damage is concerned everything up to a thousand dollars can be adjudicated by the department.

Some question has been raised as to what is necessary for relief. All that is necessary for the Committee on Claims to do is to offer an amendment that will increase the amount to $2,000, $3,000, or $5,000. The bill as originally introduced provided for $3,000. It was amended in the Senate, the $3,000 was stricken out, and $1,000 was written in. The work of the Claims Committee and the membership of the House would be benefited tremendously if the Claims Committee would introduce a resolution amending this act and make the amount at least $3,000. For the information of the Members they ought to know this fact.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Speaker, I take this occasion to reenforce again the opinion I expressed the other day that the amount of damages the departments may pay for injuries in tort actions arising, for instance, out of conditions occurring from the operation of postal trucks, Army trucks, or Navy trucks should be increased from $500 to at least $3,000.

Mr. UNDERHILL. It is $1,000 now.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman from Massachusetts says it is $1,000 now. I take issue with this statement, because it is only $1,000 so far as property damage is concerned.

I am seeking to confer due jurisdiction upon the departments in cases of injuries to persons where the limit is $500.

I have been interested in the operation of the law passed in 1930 conferring jurisdiction upon the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to pay up to $5,000 in all tort actions, and I find that the law has operated effectively.

I am taking this occasion to try to impress upon the legislative committees having jurisdiction of the general legislation to bring in some relief legislation so as to relieve Congress of the necessity of passing upon the determination of these little tort actions. I would rather have the judgment of the department heads supervised by the Comptroller General than to have that heavy burden thrown upon committees of the House which are already overburdened with the consideration of claims that can not be considered by the department heads.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. I yield.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman knows the reason that has not been embodied into legislation long ago, does he not? It simply has been used in another body as patronage, misused; and we can not get it through the other body.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in sympathy with the policy of having adopted the resolution introduced by my good friend, the gentleman from Mississippi, to have a committee appointed to recommend some legislative means whereby the Congress will be relieved of the tedium and burden of passing upon all these bills, many of minor consequence.

Mr. HARLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. HARLAN. There was such a bill prepared and it has the approval of the Comptroller General and the Attorney General's department, as well as the Court of Claims, but the Bureau of the Budget requested that it be not introduced or pushed at this session because of the condition of the Budget.

Mr. STAFFORD. As far as the Bureau of the Budget is concerned they are not to be considered in this matter. It is the relief of the Congress of the United States and particularly the House of Representatives.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STAFFORD. Yes.

Mr. COLLINS. Why should the Bureau of the Budget object to saving about $20,000,000 a year to the people of the United States?

Mr. STAFFORD. They are entirely out of their province in asserting any jurisdiction over affairs that burden the Congress of the United States, and particularly the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEONARD L. DILGER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1927, for the relief of Leonard L. Dilger.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Leonard L. Dilger, who was a member of Company L, Third Regiment United States Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of that organization on the 25th day of September, 1899: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

THOMAS G. CARLIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6333, for the relief of Thomas G. Carlin.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will ask the proponent of the bill if he is willing to accept an amendment providing that no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have no objection to such an amendment but I think this man is entitled to a reexamination. Here is a man who served during the war. He was gassed on the other side and remained in the hospital for several months. Then he went to Panama and remained there for two or three years. He was in the Walter Reed Hospital and he resigned under mental strain, and all he is asking is to be permitted to go before a board and be reexamined. That is all.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If the gentleman will accept such an amendment, then I will not object.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I will accept the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I object.

SALE OF A PORTION OF THE SITE OF THE POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOMHOUSE BUILDING IN NEWARK, N. J.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8980, to provide for the sale of a portion of the site of the post-office and customhouse building in Newark, N. J., to the city of Newark for use as a public street.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire of the author of the bill or the committee reporting the bill why the report does not incorporate the recommendation of the department concerning this matter?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Unfortunately, I did not draw the report, but this bill and its companion bill, Calendar 410, were submitted to the Treasury Department and received its full approval. As a matter of fact, the bills as presented were drawn in the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. I shall not object in this instance, but under reservation of objection I wish to say that the Committee on Public Lands is not incorporating in their reports any letters or recommendations from the department. It eases the membership of the House considerably to have the views of the department incorporated in the report.

Mr. LEHLBACH. I regret the omission, over which I had no control. However, I can assure the gentleman that not only is the Treasury Department in favor of the legislation but actually drew the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. This criticism is not leveled at this bill alone, but at all bills coming from that committee. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the hereinafter-described land, forming a portion of the site of the post-office and customhouse building in the city of Newark, N. J., be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury to the city of Newark, N. J., a municipal corporation of New Jersey, for use as a public street, at a price not less than that determined to be the value of the land and improvements thereon by three appraisers to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, and at such time and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper; the land to be sold pursuant hereto being located in the city of Newark, N. J., and described as follows:

Beginning at a point in the westerly line of Broad Street distant 129.09 feet northerly from the point of intersection of the westerly line of Broad Street with the northerly line of Academy Street; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the northwest with the said westerly line of Broad Street produced of 93° 15′ 46″, a distance of 219.11 feet to a point; thence northerly along a line making an interior angle on the northeast with the line last above described of 87° 30′ 14″, a distance of 31.96 feet to a point; thence easterly along a line making an interior angle on the southeast with the line last above described of 92° 28′ 50″, a distance of 219.53 feet to a point in the westerly line of Broad Street; thence southerly along the westerly line of Broad Street, said westerly line of Broad Street making an interior angle on the southwest with the line last above described of 86° 45′ 10″, a distance of 31.93 feet to the point of beginning.

SEC. 2. That upon the payment of the purchase price the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to convey said land to the city of Newark, N. J., by the usual quitclaim deed, subject, however, to such reservations, limitations, conditions, or reversionary rights as said Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds of such sale be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt derived from the sale of public property.

SEC. 4. That the remaining portion of said site, together with the buildings thereon, shall be sold at public sale after due advertisement, at such time and such price and upon such terms as may be deemed proper by the Secretary of the Treasury, who is hereby authorized to execute and deliver the usual quitclaim deed to the purchaser; and that the proceeds of such sale be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as a miscellaneous receipt from the sale of public property.

SEC. 5. So much of existing law as provides for the sale of the present post office and customhouse site and building for not less than a stipulated amount is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SALE OF AN EASEMENT FOR A RAILWAY RIGHT OF WAY OVER THE POST-OFFICE AND CUSTOMHOUSE SITE AT NEWARK, N. J.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8981 to provide for the sale of an easement for a railway right of way over the post-office and customhouse site at Newark, N. J.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I was under a misapprehension when the prior bill was under consideration. I was under the impression we were considering Calendar No. 408. I would like to make the parliamentary inquiry as to what became of Calendar No. 408?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is no such calendar number.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then I was misled. I intended to object to two of the sections of the former bill. But, of course, I lost my rights. I can not see the need of section 4 and section 5, and I will say to the gentleman from New Jersey that I was directing my inquiry before under a misapprehension as to what was under consideration. I thought Calendar No. 408 was under consideration. In the bill that has just been passed we provide for the public sale of the remainder of the site.

In section 5 all existing laws are repealed. I was in sympathy with the general purpose as carried in the first three sections of the bill, but could not see the need of sections 4 and 5, and while the bill has passed the objection stage, I would be indebted to the gentleman if he would explain the matter, because it has applicability to the bill now under consideration.

Mr. LEHLBACH. There is now on the statute books a law which directs the sale of this site of which 31 feet is hereby authorized to be sold to the city of Newark as one parcel. In order to provide for the sale of the remainder of the site, after 31 feet has been acquired by the city of Newark, section 4 is necessary authorizing specifically such sale of the remaining portion of the site because the law says at present that the site is to be sold in one parcel. Section 5 repeals that previous authorization and in order to make the proposition complete sections 4 and 5 are deemed necessary by the Treasury Department.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire whether it is the opinion of the gentleman that the present is a proper time for the sale of any Government property?

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is not intended to sell it at the present time. It is intended to sell it after the new building has been erected, the Government activities moved to it, and the present site vacated, which will be several years hence; and even at that time the Treasury may exercise its discretion in the matter.

Mr. STAFFORD. Coming now to the bill under consideration, Calendar No. 410, may I inquire, under a reservation of objection, what is the need of section 4 of the pending bill? Perhaps the explanation the gentleman has just made applies equally to the present bill.

Mr. LEHLBACH. It is necessary for the same reason. The present law provides for the sale of the fee simple of the entire plot. This allows the immediate granting of an easement over 2 feet underground at the present site.

Mr. STAFFORD. And this bill has also been approved and recommended by the Treasury Department?

Mr. LEHLBACH. Yes.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an easement for a right of way for a city railway over the hereinafter-described land forming a portion of the site of the post-office and customhouse building in the city of Newark, N. J., be sold by the Secretary of the Treasury to the city of Newark, N. J., a municipal corporation of New Jersey, at a price not less than that determined to be the value thereof by three appraisers to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, at such time and upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper; the land to be subject to the easement to be granted pursuant hereto being located in the city of Newark, N. J., and described as follows:

Beginning at a point in the westerly line of Broad Street distant 132.73 feet northerly from the point of intersection of the westerly line of Broad Street with the northerly line of Academy Street; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the northwest with the said westerly line of Broad Street produced of 93° 3′ 31″, a distance of 13.97 feet to a point; thence northerly along a line making an interior angle on the northeast with the line last above described of 86° 36′ 35″, a distance of 20.45 feet to a point; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the northeast with the line last above described of 269° 8′ 50″, a distance of 60.16 feet to a point; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the north with the line last above described of 184° 22′ 31″, a distance of 37.77 feet to a point; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the north with the line last above described of 180° 33′ 37″, a distance of 68.21 feet to a point; thence westerly along a line making an interior angle on the north with the line last above described of 180° 45′ 13″, a distance of 39.63 feet to a point; thence northerly along a line making an interior angle on the northeast with the line last above described of 86° 15′ 43″, a distance of 4.51 feet to a point; thence easterly along a line making an interior angle on the southeast with the line last above described of 92° 28′ 50″, a distance of 219.53 feet to a point in the westerly line of Broad Street; thence southerly along the westerly line of Broad Street, said westerly line of Broad Street making an interior angle on the southwest with the line last above described of 86° 45′ 10″, a distance of 28.29 feet to the point of beginning.

SEC. 2. That upon the payment of the purchase price of said easement for a right of way for a city railway, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to convey by deed of easement a right of way for a city railway over the said lands to the city of Newark, N. J., subject, however, to such reservations, limitations, or conditions as said Secretary of the Treasury may deem proper.

SEC. 3. That the proceeds of the sale of such easement for right of way be deposited in the Treasury of the United States as "miscellaneous receipts" derived from the sale of public property.

SEC. 4. So much of existing law as provides for the sale of the present post-office and customhouse site and building for not less than a stipulated amount is hereby repealed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NELLIE T. FRANCIS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8479, for the relief of Nellie T. Francis.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOE ANDREWS CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 650, for the relief of Joe Andrews Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Andrews Co., of Los Angeles, Calif., to compensate it for the repairing of an automobile damaged while in use by the Navy Department during the influenza epidemic of 1918.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SAMUEL WEINSTEIN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6797, for the relief of Samuel Weinstein.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Samuel Weinstein, in compensation for the death of his son, Charles Weinstein, caused by the reckless driving of an automobile by a Federal prohibition agent.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$5,000."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the customary attorneys' fee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: At the end of line 8, insert a colon and the following:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CHIPPEWA INDIANS OF MINNESOTA

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 9388, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend or renew the contract of employment of the attorneys employed to represent the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota in litigation arising in the Court of Claims under the act of May 14, 1926.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I object.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. PITTENGER. There is a bill that passed the Senate that is identical with the bill on the House Calendar. If this bill does not pass, the litigation in which these Indians are engaged is at a standstill. The contract for employment runs out, and unless the department is authorized to make a new contract a lot of money that has been spent in litigation will be wasted.

Mr. COLLINS. Will this bill enable the attorneys to get a larger fee than was originally agreed upon?

Mr. PITTENGER. A representative of the Indian Department was before the committee. The old contract provided for a cash payment out of Indian funds, and the new contract is a contingent proposition, to be worked out by the department.

Mr. COLLINS. I do not think the gentleman understood my question.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman repeat it?

Mr. COLLINS. I want to find out if this bill will enable the attorneys to receive a larger fee than was originally contracted for.

Mr. PITTENGER. I heard the gentleman's question, and my answer is that under the old contract they were given cash payments out of the Indian funds, and under the new policy they will not do that. Under this bill they will be on a contingent basis.

Mr. COLLINS. What will the contingent fee amount to?

Mr. PITTENGER. No one can tell.

Mr. COLLINS. I mean in percentage.

Mr. PITTENGER. They have made claims which may be rejected, and other claims may be allowed.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the attorneys receive as much as 50 per cent of the amount collected?

Mr. PITTENGER. No; they can only receive 5 per cent.

Mr. COLLINS. Will that include the amount already paid?

Mr. PITTENGER. That is my understanding.

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, is the gentleman from Minnesota a member of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

Mr. PITTENGER. No; but I have given a great deal of attention to this.

Mr. STAFFORD. This is a proposal of some moment to the Indians, and yet we have in the report no reference or letter from the Bureau of Indian Affairs, or the head of the department. We ought not to pass these matters relating to Indians without knowing the attitude of the Department. These Indians are the wards of the Government; and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, and afterwards the United States, should look out for their wards.

In the past these attorneys have been receiving $6,000 a year. What have they been doing? When I practiced law I thought $6,000 was a pretty good fee.

Mr. PITTENGER. All of these matters were gone into before the Committee on Indian Affairs, and with two or three representatives from the department. The original bill was objectionable, and for that reason substitute language has been used, and the bill was really drafted by the Committee on Indian Affairs, with representatives of the bureau present.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Will the lawyers apply the $60,000 they have already received to the contingent fee if this bill is passed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, these attorneys that feed on the Government, who look up hoary claims for the Indians, never give up any fees that they once obtain. Here are attorneys who have received annually $6,000, yet they have done practically nothing. The Indians have got tired of paying money out of their treasury, and for the time being, until we have a report, I am constrained to object.

Mr. PITTENGER. Will the gentleman withhold that? Let me say that all of these matters were gone over before the committee, and there is not any more cash to be paid out.

My colleague is misinformed about the delay in litigation. The attorneys are not at fault. This litigation has had their active and personal attention. They were selected by the department because of their standing and ability, and they are representing the Indians as well as can be done. Delays occur in any litigation, especially where there are complicated claims, as exist in these cases. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs knows what is going on. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD], is present, and I think he will bear me out that this new contract that the department has asked for and is authorized to draw is really in the interest of the Indians. As matters now stand, unless you get this through, their litigation is just held up.

Mr. HOWARD. My recollection is the extension of this contract is asked for by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. I do not make that as a positive statement, but that is my recollection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the chairman of the committee take back to the clerk of his committee the word that instead of having just a 1-leaf report that he go to the further expense of having a 2-leaf report, so as to incorporate the letter from the department stating their views upon the matter. I shall not interpose any objection in this instance, but I shall be inclined to do so as to others, when the report does not incorporate the recommendations of the department.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a similar Senate bill (S. 2364) on the Speaker's table will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection, and the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and hereby is, authorized to renew the contracts of employment heretofore entered into with the attorneys employed to represent the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota in the suits instituted in the Court of Claims under authority of the act of May 14, 1926 (44 Stat. L. 555), as amended, on a year-to-year basis but not to exceed three years, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem advisable and for the best interests of said Indians. Said attorneys shall be entitled to such compensation for their services, in addition to that heretofore paid to them, as the Court of Claims in its discretion may allow from any amount recovered in any such suit, which compensation shall not exceed the sum of 5 per cent of any such recovery for the attorney for the Chippewa of White Earth Reservation and a like compensation for the firm of attorneys employed by the other bands of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota: Provided, however, That the Secretary of the Interior shall continue to pay out of tribal funds belonging to the Chippewa Indians all actual and necessary expenses incurred by said attorneys in such litigation as authorized by and subject to the limitations contained in the act of April 11, 1928 (45 Stats. 423): And provided further, That the compensation and expenses of the attorney or firm of attorneys employed under existing law to represent the Red Lake Band of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota shall be paid out of any money to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

WARREN J. CLEAR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 901) for the relief of Warren J. Clear.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. We are going further and further all the time in this class of cases. We have had a lot of claims here where the Government is made an insurer for employees against the act of vandals, but we go further here now and seek to make the Government an insurer to employees against acts of God.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, this is the case of an officer who lost his property during the earthquake in Japan. Three other officers who lost property at the same time have been paid. The Comptroller General has made a rather technical ruling against this particular man. The War Department finds that this amount covers the exact amount of his loss. His property was in Tokyo and he was elsewhere at the time the earthquake occurred. He hurried to Tokyo and engaged himself in saving human life and property. In the meantime his own property was destroyed. It seems that under the law where an officer is engaged in saving human life and property and loses his own property at the same time, under similar circumstances, he is entitled to be recompensed for it, but here he happened to be losing his own property and saving the lives of other people and saving the property of other people, under not exactly identical circumstances to those under which he lost his own property. He happened to be not at his place of residence, but elsewhere, engaged in the performance of his duty, but at the same time engaged in saving human life and property. Had he been at his own place in Tokyo exactly when the earthquake broke, had he done exactly the same things that he did elsewhere, and had his property been lost, as it was lost, then the Comptroller General would have recommended the payment and the man would have been paid. Three other officers have been paid under similar circumstances.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, so far as the facts in this case are concerned, as they were divulged to us, this man was an attaché at the embassy at Tokyo. He was not in Tokyo at the time of the earthquake, but he did, according to the statement, assist in evacuating some 30 foreign women and children, not even American citizens, after the earthquake was all over. He did not arrive in time. There were hundreds of other American citizens in Tokyo doing what any other Anglo-Saxon would have done, saving women and children, and the Government is not reimbursing them for their property. I object.

GEORGE H. HOLMAN

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2650) for the relief of George H. Holman.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, George H. Holman, late a private in Company B, Thirty-third United States Volunteer Infantry, and in Company E, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, shall be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States, as a member of said Company E, Twelfth Regiment United States Infantry, on the 27th day of February, 1904: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

SIDNEY JOSEPH KENT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7385) for the relief of Sidney Joseph Kent.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged sailors, Sidney Joseph Kent, who enlisted in the United States Navy in January, 1918, and who was discharged on October 23, 1918, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the naval service of the United States: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

ESSIE FINGAR

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5786) for the relief of Essie Finger.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Essie Finger, blind and dependent sister of George William Finger, late boatswain's mate, second class, United States Navy, a sum equal to six months' gratuity pay, as provided for under the act of May 22, 1928.

With the following committee amendments:

On lines 5 and 7, strike out "Finger" and insert "Fingar."

The committee amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

The title was amended to read: "A bill for the relief of Essie Fingar."

WILLIAM GIRARD JOSEPH BENNETT

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 860) for the relief of William Girard Joseph Bennett.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon persons honorably discharged from the United States Navy, William Girard Joseph Bennett shall be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the United States Navy on the 29th day of April, 1921: Provided, That no bounty, back pay, pension, or allowance shall be held to have accrued prior to the passage of this act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

THEODORE W. BELAND

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1409, for the relief of Theodore W. Beland.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

GEORGE M. PEED

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2927, for the relief of George M. Peed.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of George M. Peed, 4⅞ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Nos. 17951 to 17954, inclusive, for $500 each, dated September 16, 1929, and maturing June 16, 1930, without presentation of said bonds, the bonds having been lost or stolen while in the possession of the said George M. Peed, the legal owner and holder thereof: Provided, That the said bonds shall not have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said George M. Peed shall first file in the Treasury Department of the United States a bond in the penal sum equal to double the amount of the principal of said bonds, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost or stolen bonds hereinbefore described.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem in favor of George M. Peed, 4⅞ per cent United States Treasury certificates of indebtedness, Nos. 17951 to 17954, inclusive, in the denomination of $500 each, dated September 16, 1929, matured June 16, 1930, series TJ–1930, without interest and without presentation of the said certificates which are alleged to have been lost or stolen: Provided, That the said certificates of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented and paid, and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which may have been attached to the certificates: Provided further, That said George M. Peed shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the principal of said certificates of indebtedness in such form and with such corporate surety as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the certificates of indebtedness hereinbefore described."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

J. R. REIMER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2935, for the relief of J. R. Reimer.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of J. R. Reimer, postmaster at Clinton, Okla., for $459.90 unlawfully paid to a substitute clerk, C. H. Markum, for vehicle hire.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LIEUT. ENOCH GRAF

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 4887, for the relief of Lieut. Enoch Graf.

Mr. PATTERSON. Reserving the right to object, it does not seem to impress me strongly that this officer is entitled to this benefit. I would like to have a statement from the gentleman who is the author of the bill.

Mr. HOLLISTER. This is one of three officers under whom certain peculations occurred at Camp Custer, Mich., on the part of a civilian employee in the Quartermaster Corps. One of these officers has already been reimbursed. The second officer has had a bill reported in his favor providing for reimbursement. This man, the third officer, is the one who discovered the peculations. It is he who is responsible for getting the man and for getting certain property from him to reimburse the Government. He is also responsible for making certain changes in the regulations so that the condition can not occur again.

Mr. COLLINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. COLLINS. These peculations went on for 10 years.

Mr. HOLLISTER. They went on for 10 years, and this is the last man of the three.

Mr. COLLINS. If these officers had been at all alert, they could have discovered these peculations long before they did. The officers are still in the Army, are they not?

Mr. HOLLISTER. It was this man who discovered the peculations. The first man was reimbursed by the Government.

Mr. COLLINS. It seems that officers, if attentive to duty, should have known that something was wrong and should therefore be held responsible for the inaccuracies, peculations, and fraud, though committed by irresponsible subordinates.

Mr. HOLLISTER. I am in agreement with the gentleman as a general proposition; but it does seem that in the case of this man, who, as I say, discovered the peculations, and where one of the other officers, under whom these peculations continued for years, has already been reimbursed, he should receive the same consideration.

Mr. PATTERSON. May I ask this question? Has the Government been reimbursed? Will the Government be at any loss if this bill is allowed?

Mr. HOLLISTER. The Government has already been reimbursed by this officer in the sum of $4,000.

Mr. PATTERSON. And this is to give it back to him, and the Government will be the loser?

Mr. HOLLISTER. No. The officer got back about half of what he got. This is the amount for which this officer is left holding the bag.

Mr. HARE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. HARE. As a matter of fact, is not the War Department charged with the responsibility, through its auditors, of checking these accounts quarterly?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I imagine so, but I do not know.

Mr. HARE. I have had occasion to go into a case just like this, and I found that the auditor of the War Department, under a regulation and under an act, is required to audit these accounts quarterly, and these officers have the right to rely upon the audits of the auditors and are, therefore, not charged with having extra knowledge of auditing accounts like an accountant.

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, these men are officers connected with the Finance Department of the Army.

Mr. HARE. I would like to have my question answered. I want to know whether or not, as a matter of fact, under the regulations, these accounts had been audited by the War Department.

Mr. COLLINS. These officers are the auditors of the War Department.

Mr. HARE. Then, they had not been audited by the auditing department of the War Department?

Mr. COLLINS. There is no such department by name in the War Department.

Mr. HARE. Oh, yes, there is. I disagree with the gentleman.

Mr. COLLINS. The auditing department of the War Department is the finance department, of which these officers are members.

Mr. HOLLISTER. The War Department specifically recommends that this allowance be made.

Mr. COLLINS. Oh, yes; because Congress has abated claims against two other officers who were in the same predicament as this officer. The idea being that if one officer was granted relief all should be accorded the same treatment—a policy to which I usually subscribe.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOLLISTER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. There is another thing in favor of this man. This is the officer who discovered that the peculations were going on, and there is nothing to show how long he was on duty; whether it covered the period of time he was actually in control of the situation or not.

Mr. COLLINS. The gentleman is mistaken about that. This man was charged with the peculations which occurred during the time he was responsible, and only for that particular period of time.

Mr. HOLLISTER. That is correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object for the present.

J. H. WALLACE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5820, for the relief of J. H. Wallace.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I reserve my objection.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. This is a bill offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. WILLIAMS]. I had occasion to report it in the Claims Committee. Is the gentleman familiar with the facts of the bill?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I am familiar with them as they appear in the report.

I know from my examination of various other reports and my own personal experience that in cases which are proper cases for relief, the Comptroller General gives a letter stating that it is a proper case for relief. Such recommendation is entirely lacking here.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. There is no recommendation in the report, but it is unquestioned that this man did pay this money for this property. There was a public sale conducted in good faith by the United States Government. He paid out $250.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If it is unquestioned that he ought to have his money back it is a simple matter to get such a report from the Comptroller General.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I think the gentleman will find in the report a statement that the Comptroller General said he could not pay it back because it had been covered into the general fund.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman believes the facts as stated in the report, and we have to accept the report at its face value, this claimant paid a certain amount of money for the purchase of a piece of real estate. That money was deposited in the Treasury of the United States. He did not get the real estate. The Government has the money.

There is no law which authorizes the refunding of money after it has once been deposited in the Treasury. This bill authorizes that. They have not even allowed interest. This is merely for the reimbursing of the purchase price paid, $350. The Comptroller General would have no power to pass on the question whether the money ought to be refunded.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If the gentleman from Wisconsin is satisfied, and the gentleman from Virginia states that he knows this is an honest and just claim, of course I will not interpose any further objection. If the Government received the money under such circumstances, it should be refunded.

Mr. SMITH of Virginia. I will state to the gentleman this is my information on the subject.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. But there is no report accompanying this claim.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $450 to J. H. Wallace, of Paradise, Tex., as reimbursement of purchase money paid for real estate formerly owned by William Lyons and sold by the collector of internal revenue at a distraint sale March 14, 1911.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 5, strike out the figures "$450" and insert the figures "$350."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

KARIM JOSEPH MERY

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7412, for the relief of Karim Joseph Mery.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there is no legal obligation on the Government, and I question the propriety of recognizing any equitable obligation in view of the fact that this injury occurred when the soldier was not on an official trip, or on authorized Government business, as appears from the report of the Secretary of War under date of March 1, 1926, which says, "Nor on authorized Government business in the training, practice, operation, or maintenance of the Army."

Mr. SWANK. The report of the War Department shows that these three soldiers were driving the truck; that they took the truck to San Antonio to get a load of stationery and stopped for lunch. After lunch they were going down the street. The report of the War Department says they were intoxicated. The evidence shows they drove clear across the street on the other side where a couple of boys were selling watermelons and cantaloupes out of a little wagon. They ran into them.

The War Department allowed the damages to the little wagon in the sum of $275, and admitted liability on that. Of course, there is no legal liability.

Mr. STAFFORD. Oh, I am not haggling on the legal liability. I am concerned as to whether the soldier was in anywise identified with Government work so that we can hold the Government liable in equity.

Mr. KLEBERG. I may say to the gentleman that if he will refer to page 3 of the report following the statement of the Secretary of War, Mr. Davis, he will find the statement of Ralph H. Miller, to which there is attached an order given to him on the afternoon following the lunch when he was asked to take the truck again and go and pick up a load of stationery. The gentleman will find this right at the top of the page, and I rely on the evidence in the case to make it perfectly plain that there is a connection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I was relying largely on the letter of the Secretary of War. I have not gone into the detailed supporting evidence.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over temporarily.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman withhold his request for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. I withhold my request.

Mr. KLEBERG. I want to explain to my colleague that in the statement of the Secretary of War it should be noted the department took no cognizance of the element of personal injury. They referred in this investigation entirely to property loss, and in this connection the report calls attention to the well-established principle of law that the Government can not be held legally liable for the torts of its agents. In so far as the personal-injury element of this case is concerned, in the same report it is stated that this must be provided by special act of Congress. They withhold the recommendation either for or against the accompanying bill clearly for the reason the War Department had not taken cognizance of the personal-injury element involved and was referring that matter directly to the Congress.

I hope the gentleman will allow the bill to pass.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over temporarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

CARRIE PRICE ROBERTS

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7639, for the relief of Carrie Price Roberts.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I will.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, this is the case of a contractor carrying mail for the Government who was shot down by county officers. The department reports that this bill should pass. This man, while actually in the performance of his duty in protecting the United States mail, was held up by armed men. He stepped down from the truck. What his purpose was we do not know, but when he stepped down he was shot down by these men who happened to be officers of the law. He was ruthlessly shot down by them without any information from them as to why they were stopping him or anything else. I think under such circumstances the gentleman should not object. I believe his widow is entitled to some compensation.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If the widow is entitled to compensation, this must be a case that clearly comes under the compensation laws of the United States; and if it does not come under those laws, you should not be here asking that this employee of the Government be given any more consideration than any other employee of the United States. If it is such a case and the gentleman will redraft the bill and authorize this widow to make her claim to the Employees' Compensation Commission, so that the rights in the matter may be determined, I shall not object.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that we may be permitted to call this bill up later in the day for the purpose of offering such an amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, star-route contractors are not employees of the Government of the United States and do not come within the provisions of the employees' compensation act. I am not willing to grant the benefits of the employees' compensation act to individual contractors for the Government in the performance of their contract obligations. If this contractor in performing his contract for the United States suffered death, perhaps we, in the grace of the Government, should pay out a certain definite amount, but certainly not $10,000, because that is violative of the policy of this Congress in recognizing the payment of death claims. I am unwilling to extend the privileges of the compensation act to such cases as these, as it might mean thousands upon thousands of dollars in claims imposed on the Treasury. The gentleman from Colorado will recognize that a star-route carrier is a contract officer of the Government, just like any other contractor. It is true he is performing work for the Government, but he is not an employee of the Government in the true sense of the word, and it is questionable whether we should recognize any liability in those cases.

Mr. BLACK. Will not the gentleman permit the bill to pass if we reduce the amount to $5,000?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be passed over temporarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DON C. FEES

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 229, for the relief of Don C. Fees.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to allow in the accounts of Don C. Fees, disbursing clerk, Department of Justice, the sum of $33.80, paid by him under authority and direction of said department for the purchase, in the open market, of 2,600 manila envelopes, which was disallowed by said Comptroller General.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

ROSS E. ADAMS

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 2909, for the relief of Ross E. Adams.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to Ross E. Adams, of Nashua, Mont., out of any money in the Treasury deposited to the credit of the Fort Peck Indians, a sum equal to the amount found by the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have been paid by the said Ross E. Adams in excess of lawful requirements on account of his original homestead entry on lands within the Fort Peck Indian Reservation, less any amounts unpaid on the date of enactment of this act on account of his additional entry made on May 21, 1926, on lands within such reservation. Such sum shall be in full satisfaction of his claim for a refund of overpayments on account of such original entry, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to issue patent to the lands covered by such additional entry without the requirement of any further payments.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

NICK VASILZEVIC

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 1780, for the relief of the legal guardian of Nick Vasilzevic.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of some one why it is the duty of the Government to pay this claim. It seems there was some wine on the floor, that this lady was turning on an electric light, and was electrocuted. The gentleman from Wisconsin believes that the wine on the floor plus defective electric-light fixtures caused the death of this lady.

Mr. SCHAFER. If the gentleman will yield, I believe that in one minute and a half I can convince him that the Government ought to pay this amount. Federal prohibition agents, operating under a search warrant, searched the home of the deceased mother of the beneficiary of this bill.

They poured the confiscated spirits down the sink, as the report from the department indicates, but they poured the confiscated wine on a dirt basement, and as a result the spirit of this little boy's mother is in the great beyond at the present time. While the agents were taking the husband, the owner of the premises, to jail, the mother went down in the basement to turn off the electric light. By reason of the fact that the wine had been poured on the dirt an electric contact resulted in her electrocution. If the agents had not poured the wine on the basement floor but had poured it down the sink, the same way they poured the spirits down the sink, the spirit of this boy's mother would not be in the great beyond to-day. A reading of the committee report shows that Mr. Woodcock, the Director of the Prohibition Department, censured the agents and said they exceeded their authority. As an attorney, the gentleman knows that a prohibition agent is a law-enforcement agent, but that as such enforcement agent he has no legal authority to act as judge and jury, to confiscate and destroy property.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, when this inquest took place in my home city, arising out of an incident in my district, I believe on the upper north side of Milwaukee, I naturally followed it, and particularly followed it, after the gentleman from Wisconsin gave forth an interview to the papers that he was going to introduce a bill for the relief of this child. I was rather impressed with the finding of the coroner's inquest, to the effect that there was a defective electric-light bulb which was the contributing cause of this injury. What has my colleague to say about that?

Mr. SCHAFER. The defective light bulb could not contribute to the death of anyone who turned that light on or off until the prohibition agents spilled the wine on the dirt floor, thereby making a contact. Therefore the pouring of the wine is the primary causation of the passing of this poor, unfortunate woman, with the result that she has left this little child 7 years of age. In view of these facts, and in view of the fact that the Prohibition Director's report indicates negligence on the part of the agents in pouring the wine on the dirt floor, and in view of the fact that the Director of Prohibition censured the agents for so doing, I believe this is about as meritorious a bill as there is on this Private Calendar.

Mr. MEAD. If the gentleman will permit, let me say in verifying the statement he has made to the effect that the agents contributed to the death of this woman, that anyone who knows anything about electricity knows that liquid of any kind poured upon a cellar floor or any other place immediately becomes a conductor of electricity and endangers the life of anyone who places any part of his body in contact with an electrical circuit of high voltage. Had the cellar floor been dry or left in a dry condition by the agent; in other words, if this liquid had not been poured on the floor to dampen the feet of this woman, no matter how many defective light bulbs she may have touched, there would be no current passing through her body because of the resistance of the dry floor, her stockings, and shoes. So the presence of the liquid, spilled by the Federal agent, made possible the contact and made her body a conductor of electricity and brought about the condition explained by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman is absolutely correct. No one can contradict that statement. There is certain prima facie evidence that the action of the Federal prohibition agents in pouring the wine on the dirt floor, illegally, was the immediate cause of the death and not simply a contributing cause.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Grover Kruecke, electrical inspector of the city of Milwaukee, testified at the coroner's inquest that the light cord was frayed and dangerous and that the light socket was a brass affair, the use of which was not recommended, and the inspector indicates in his testimony that the condition of the light cord and the socket was responsible for this woman's death. Under these circumstances I can not see why it is the duty of the Government to pay $5,000 or any other amount.

Mr. SCHAFER. There is absolutely nothing to indicate that the condition of the light socket was the cause of death. If the gentleman knows anything about electricity——

Mr. COLLINS. I am reading from the report that is submitted along with this bill.

Mr. SCHAFER. It may have been a contributing cause of the death. If there was any defect whatever in the light socket, when the agents poured the wine on the floor the contact would have been made and was made and resulted in this death. If the agents had not entered the premises and if they had not poured the wine on the dirt floor, there certainly could not have been any possibility of any short circuiting causing the death of this little boy's mother.

Mr. COLLINS. For the present I shall be compelled to object. If later I find additional evidence to justify the passage of the bill, I will advise the gentleman. Mr. Speaker, I object.

NEILL GROCERY CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 549, for the relief of the Neill Grocery Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Neill Grocery Co., Wheeling, W. Va., the sum of $2,531.97, plus interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from October 13, 1920, to the date of the enactment of this act. Such sum represents the amount of a fine and court costs paid on such date, by such company, pursuant to a conviction for violating certain provisions of the Lever Act of August 10, 1917, as amended, prior to the declaration by the Supreme Court of the United States of the invalidity of such provisions.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 6, after the figures, strike out the words "plus interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from October 13, 1920, to the date of the enactment of this act."

And on page 2, line 2, insert:

"Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ROSA E. PLUMMER

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 755, for the relief of Rosa E. Plummer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to direct the attention of the author of the bill to the fact that this claimant has had her day in court. Certainly, under the provisions of this act we could not permit Congress to determine liability under the compensation act when the Compensation Commission has found she was not entitled to the privileges of that act.

Mr. BRUMM. We have gone all over that. All that was discussed and gone over, I may say to the gentleman. This was a progressive thing. This woman had no more idea she was going to become blind when the trouble started than anything in the world, and in this way she was misled. The merits of the matter seem to absolutely warrant consideration of this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report states that the claimant "filed a claim with the commission on June 29, 1920, alleging she was injured on or about March 23, 1918, while employed as an operative in the trimming room, examining division, of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing; that her disability is indefinite blindness in both eyes and alleging as the cause of the injury 'aggravated by glaring lights,' which caused severe headaches while on night shift. The finding of the commission upon her claim was that the evidence then available failed to show that the disability complained of was the result of her employment by the Government."

Mr. BRUMM. "Then available."

Mr. STAFFORD. She had her day in court under the employees' compensation act.

Mr. HOPE. If the gentleman will permit, let me say to the gentleman that the report, I think, is in error in stating that this claim was denied on its merits.

Mr. BRUMM. It does not say it was denied on its merits.

Mr. HOPE. But the claim was denied for the reason it was filed after more than a year had elapsed, and under the statute governing such matters, the claim must be filed within one year.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If the gentleman will yield, there is nothing in the report to show anything about that.

Mr. HOPE. That is true, but if you will check up the time when the injury occurred, the time she was dismissed, and the time she put in her claim, you will find that more than a year elapsed.

I have the Senate report here on the Senate bill which reads as follows:

But the claim was disallowed by the commission on July 6, 1920, on the ground that the compensation act specifically provides that notice and claim must be filed within a year of the date of the injury.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Is there anything from the commission incorporated in the Senate report?

Mr. HOPE. I do not think there is anything in the report from the commission, but the committee did have a report from the commission from which this report was formulated.

Mr. BRUMM. And I may say that it was never turned down on its merits at any time.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Then the report before us here is wrong.

Mr. BRUMM. It is not wrong. It does not say it was turned down on its merits.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The report says, "The finding of the commission upon her claim was that the evidence then available failed to show that the disability complained of was the result of her employment by the Government."

Mr. BRUMM. Yes; "then available." This trouble was of a progressive nature.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. But the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. HOPE] says there never was a hearing on the claim. It was turned down because it was filed more than one year after the accident. If that is true, under all the facts of the case, I have no objection to having the usual form of bill substituted for this bill now pending, and permitting the woman to make her claim before the Employees' Compensation Commission, with the usual provision that no benefits shall accrue before the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if this claimant was barred from the determination and examination of the claim on the merits because she had not filed it within the statutory period, in line with the policy this House has adopted, I have no objection to submitting her claim to the Employees' Compensation Commission for determination on its merits. I have prepared an amendment to enable the commission to determine whether she is entitled to anything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore [Mr. MCDUFFIE]. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, the Senate bill (S. 111) was substituted for the House bill.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in favor of Rosa E. Plummer, a former employee in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing: Provided, That compensation, if any, shall commence from and after the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following substitute for the Senate bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. STAFFORD moves to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Rosa E. Plummer as to whether she suffered an injury while employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, compensable under said act and after the date of its enactment, purporting to have been injured on or about March 23, 1918, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Rosa E. Plummer had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

EDWARD J. O'NEIL

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1203, for the relief of Edward J. O'Neil.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill, Calendar No. 433, and the next bill, Calendar No. 434, may be passed until later in the afternoon.

Mr. SCHAFER. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to call these up to-day?

Mr. BACHMANN. I do.

Mr. PATTERSON. The bills will be taken up later in the day?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from West Virginia?

There was no objection.

WILLIAM DALTON

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 1289, for the relief of William Dalton.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. Reserving the right to object, this bill fails to carry the date and place of the injury for which they desire compensation. Does the gentleman from Missouri know the date the injury occurred?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes. I made a thorough investigation, because there was a controversy between the prohibition agents and the marshal as to who was responsible. All the facts and affidavits are on file—reports, affidavits, statements of the chief of police of St. Louis, and Public Health Service doctor. The Government agents poured over 2,000 gallons of alcohol into the gutter of a public street, some one tossed a match in the alcohol, and the boy was burned. This occurred July 20, 1925, on a street in the city of St. Louis. The act of the Government officials was in direct violation of city ordinances; but you realize the city police have no control over Federal agents and United States marshals. The boy was on the sidewalk, within his rights, and sustained burns that resulted in the young man contracting a permanent disability as he developed nephritis. The sum allowed by the committee, $1,500, in no way fully compensates him for his permanent disability. I understand his life is practically ruined. Of course, I could do nothing but accept the $1,500, in view of the committee's recommendation.

Mr. BACHMANN. I am not objecting to the principle involved in the bill, but the bill should show upon its face when this occurred and where it occurred.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I can amend the bill by inserting, it occurred in St. Louis, Mo.

Mr. SCHAFER. Here it is. The accident occurred on July 20, 1925. The report shows that.

Mr. STAFFORD. Further reserving the right to object, there seems to be a vacuity of information so far as the extent of the injury is concerned.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. That is what the report states, but the file is here, and if I could read the testimony as submitted to the committee it would show that even up to six months ago this boy was seriously ill. He has been an invalid practically since 1925.

Mr. STAFFORD. How extensive were the burns?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. They were first-degree burns, most severe. I think that is what the doctors stated in their affidavits.

Mr. STAFFORD. If this young man has suffered from the effect of alcoholism, from external application, to the extent that the gentleman says, and if he is now suffering from nephritis, as the result of alcohol applied externally and not internally, I have no objection, on the assurance of the gentleman from Missouri that the boy is still suffering.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right further to object. The report shows that the accident occurred in 1925.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. On July 20, 1925, on a public street in St. Louis.

Mr. BACHMANN. The gentleman will agree to an amendment stating that this happened in St. Louis, Mo., upon that date?

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. BACHMANN. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. I thought that the city of St. Louis was a very liberal place and that they really appreciated good liquor there.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. We do, the same as they do in Milwaukee.

Mr. STAFFORD. In Milwaukee conditions have never occurred where good whisky has been poured into the gutter. We pour it there through different channels.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. This, however, was alcohol, not good whisky. I doubt if good whisky ever finds its way to gutters and sewers in St. Louis and I am sure it never does in Milwaukee, although I might add the Prohibition Unit has always been very active in St. Louis, more so I think than it has been in Milwaukee and some of the supposed-to-be-dry cities of the country. The violations of the prohibition act are no greater in St. Louis than in any other large city. That, however, has no bearing upon the pending bill. It is a meritorious bill and should be passed. My only regret is that the committee reduced the amount to $1,500. The young man is just another victim of the eighteenth amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $5,000 to William Dalton, to compensate him for first-degree burns received while walking on a public sidewalk, due to United States Government agents pouring alcohol into a gutter on a public highway, said alcohol being ignited as a result of some unknown person throwing a match in the gutter.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, strike out "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500," and in line 6, after the word "to," insert "the legal guardian of."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BACHMANN: Page 1, line 8, after the word "sidewalk" and the comma, insert the words "in St. Louis, Mo., on July 20, 1925."

The amendment was agreed to; and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

GEORGE DACAS

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2539) for the relief of George Dacas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. I note that the Government was not exercising any jurisdiction over those premises at the time the injury was suffered by the deceased intestate.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Speaker, the Government was exercising jurisdiction over these explosives. I hold in my hand, and the gentleman will find reference to it in the report, a letter from T. C. Locke, captain, Quartermaster Corps, formerly commanding officer at Camp Gordon, in which he states the facts with reference to his control over those explosives. He states that he sold them on the day following the accident or a day or two after that to a man named Belfor. I have an affidavit from Mr. Belfor stating that he bought them a day or two after this accident, and at the time he was examining them in the company of the captain of the Quartermaster Corps he heard about the injury to this boy, George Racas, and both the letter of the Quartermaster Corps officer and the affidavit of the purchaser set out the fact that they recovered this sack of dynamite caps, or whatever they were, that these young boys had taken from this place. The magazine was unlocked. I do not know who unlocked it, but it certainly can not be held against an 8-year-old boy that he would get hold of these caps. He was not old enough to be responsible. There is no question about the fact. The Government owned these explosives, and it sold them to this man Belfor a day or two after the accident occurred.

Mr. STAFFORD. In this case we are handicapped because the report does not contain any of the evidence which was submitted by the department criticizing the claim.

For the time being, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this claim may go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

J. B. HUDSON

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 2534, for the relief of J. B. Hudson.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, the author of the bill will have no objection to having the bill made definite, so as to show the automobile accident out of which these things occurred?

Mr. RAMSPECK. No, sir.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250 to J. B. Hudson, said sum representing deduction in pay while a sergeant in the United States Army.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: At the end of the bill insert "for damages arising out of an automobile accident during the month of October, 1918, being in full settlement of all claims and demands against the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

COLUMBIA CASUALTY CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7668, for the relief of the Columbia Casualty Co.

Mr. PATTERSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the gentleman make an explanation of this matter.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. This is simply a stolen Government bond which the claimant has paid to the Indiana National Bank. There was a series of 40,000 bonds stolen, all of which were recovered. The company paid its liability to the bank, the bonds were all recovered except one bond, and this company is entitled to subrogation to the extent of that bond.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is, the casualty company?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The casualty company.

Mr. PATTERSON. That is the company that insured the bank?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Was not the company paid to make this assurance? Did they not collect a premium for that?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Every company collects premiums when issuing bonds. I wish the gentleman would get the point straight.

Mr. PATTERSON. I want to get it straight because I do not want to do an injustice to anybody.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The Government is not giving anything away. In fact, the company is losing over $3,000 worth of interest because the committee did not give it interest in reporting out the bill.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What the gentleman from Alabama wants to know is, did the Government suffer a loss?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. No; it did not.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Did the Government claim indemnity from the insurance company?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The Indiana National Bank had a policy of insurance with the Columbia Casualty Co. for theft. A certain number of Government bonds were sent from Chicago to Indiana, and those bonds in the bank were stolen by some one. The Indiana National Bank then made a claim on the Columbia Casualty Co. for this policy of indemnity, and they paid it. Thereafter the Secret Service and the Department of Justice located the thief and located the bonds.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. And reinstated the bonds?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Reinstated all the bonds except one bond, which was destroyed by the thief, and which has not been presented to the Treasury in almost 10 years. Now, the insurance company, which is entitled to subrogation on this particular bond, is going to give a surety company bond to the Government for double the amount of the $10,000 bond that was lost.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Indiana is quite justified in scrutinizing these private bills for casualty companies. I have never seen anything like it—cry babies, whiners, backsliders, that these casualty companies are. They will collect premiums for years, and as soon as there is a loss they start to cry, and they want their money back. All they risk is the paper that the bond is written on.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Certainly.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. In the first place, this is the first claim bill that I have ever presented. Let me say something further, as far as this case is concerned, this company did not hesitate for one moment. They paid the Indiana National Bank the full amount of its indemnity.

Mr. PATTERSON. And they were paid to do that, in premiums?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Certainly.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. They certainly do not want a congressional medal for that, do they?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Of course not. The gentleman, eminent lawyer that he is, knows that the company is entitled to subrogation. After a number of years they found the thief and found the bonds—the bonds were restored to the bank. One of the series of bonds, this bill giving the serial number, was destroyed by the thief. It was never turned in to the United States Treasury. The Treasury Department, after 10 years, is satisfied, and the casualty company is going to give a bond, even at this late date, to the United States Government for double the amount; that is, $20,000 for this lost bond.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a similar Senate bill (S. 2159) will be substituted for the House bill.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to redeem United States Treasury certificate of indebtedness, No. 14559, in the denomination of $10,000, Series T. M. 1924, dated March 15, 1923, and maturing March 15, 1924, with interest at the rate of 4½ per cent per annum from March 15, 1923, to March 15, 1924, in favor of the Columbia Casualty Co., of New York, N. Y., or its assigns, without presentation of the said certificate, the certificate of indebtedness having been lost, stolen, or destroyed: Provided, That the said certificate of indebtedness shall not have been previously presented for payment, and that no payment shall be made hereunder for any coupons which shall have been previously presented and paid: And provided further, That the said Columbia Casualty Co. of New York, N. Y., shall first file in the Treasury Department a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the lost, stolen, or destroyed Treasury certificate of indebtedness and the interest payable thereon, in such form and with such surety or sureties as may be acceptable to the Secretary of the Treasury, to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any loss on account of the lost, stolen, or destroyed certificate of indebtedness herein described.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill was laid on the table.

SARAH ANN COE

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 157, for the relief of Sarah Ann Coe.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Sarah Ann Coe, widow of John Coe, deceased, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,000 in full settlement for the death of her husband, who was killed on the morning of December 29, 1923, by a United States mail truck at Huntington, W. Va.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

J. G. SHELTON

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 217, authorizing adjustment of the claim of J. G. Shelton.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of J. G. Shelton for refund of rent paid on tract No. 30, Camp Lee Military Reservation, Va., for a six months' period beginning February 15, 1931, after claimant had been required to vacate said premises, and to allow said claim in the sum of not to exceed $37.50. There is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $37.50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of said claim.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

LEWIS SEMLER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 224, authorizing adjustment of the claim of Lewis Semler.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of Lewis Semler for blood furnished September 9 and 11, 1930, for transfusion to Roy T. Nelson, a patient in a Government hospital, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim an amount not in excess of $70. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $70, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the payment of said claim.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

HUNTER P. MULFORD

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 236, for the relief of Hunter P. Mulford.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DONALD K. WARNER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 241, for the relief of Donald K. Warner.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I would like to submit an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. In this particular case it seems that the postmaster not only left the safe unlocked but he left funds in the safe for two or three days, violating the postal regulation that required him to deposit his money every night, and the burglary was committed under these conditions. The postmaster is now asking the Government to reimburse him because of something that happened by reason of his violation of a postal regulation and his negligence in leaving the safe open.

Mr. BLACK. The facts as stated by the gentleman from Indiana are true, but, in spite of all that, the post office was robbed and the postmaster, of course, was not responsible for that.

I really believe the postmaster should get this money. There is no doubt about his being negligent regarding it to that extent, but he did keep the money in a safe and he did keep the stamps in a safe.

Mr. GRISWOLD. He might just as well have left them on a shelf.

Mr. BLACK. No; as it was, he made it a little harder for the robber.

Mr. GRISWOLD. All he had to do was to turn the knob of the safe.

Mr. STAFFORD. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee what policy his committee follows in reimbursing postmasters for postage stamps and other Government property which is carelessly left open to purloining by anyone who breaks into the premises?

Mr. BLACK. The committee has no policy on any particular category of bills before it, but the committee believes, under all the circumstances the postmaster took what might be called reasonable precaution, and even though he violated the regulations he did take some reasonable precaution. In spite of that the post office suffered a loss. We believe we should relieve the postmaster of the loss.

Mr. BACHMANN. Does the gentleman think the postmaster would have lost the money if he had not been negligent but had locked the safe?

Mr. BLACK. I do not think he would have lost the money had he locked the safe, although he might have. The robbers might have broken into the safe some other way.

Mr. BACHMANN. I am afraid we are extending the principle too far to include a case of this kind. I doubt very much whether it is a good thing to establish a principle of this kind. Had the postmaster locked the safe and it had been broken into I would have no objection, but as it is I think the gentleman from Indiana is right.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DAVID GORDON BUILDING & CONSTRUCTION CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 248, authorizing adjustment of the claim of the David Gordon Building & Construction Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of the David Gordon Building & Construction Co. arising out of certain extra work in the construction of lookout gallery and windows in the Cincinnati Post Office Building during the fiscal year 1930, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim an amount not to exceed $1,116.60. There is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,116.60, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, upon the assurance of the gentleman from Cincinnati that there is no attorney involved in the case and it being a Senate bill I shall not offer the customary attorney's-fee amendment.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

H. E. HURLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 258, authorizing adjustment of the claim of H. E. Hurley.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to adjust and settle the claim of H. E. Hurley, trading as J. E. Hurley, for damages resulting from the failure of the Government to execute and perform a contract in accordance with his proposal accepted June 27, 1928, for the installation of an ash bin in the State, War, and Navy Building, Washington, D. C., and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim the sum of not to exceed $553.50. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $553.50, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for payment of the claim.

POTOMAC ELECTRIC POWER CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 260, authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Potomac Electric Power Co., of Washington, D. C.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask some one who knows about the bill why the Potomac Electric Power Co. should be paid $2,157.25 more than the amount of their contract. If nobody is interested, I object.

GUY CLATTERBUCK

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 409, for the relief of Guy Clatterbuck.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WALTER J. BRYSON PAVING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 477, for the relief of Walter J. Bryson Paving Co.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I notice the Comptroller General states there is no merit in the claim. Having examined the bill some time ago I can not recall the exact facts.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The facts are these, as I understand them from the Comptroller General's report: This contractor removed 35,735 cubic yards less than was estimated as being in the area subject to be removed and paid for at contract prices, and then the contractor comes back and claims for overremoving out of another part of the project when he actually charged extra on the first part of the project. The contractor is really indebted to the Government.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am rather influenced by the position which the Comptroller General takes in these claims. It is very helpful to the members of the committee who scrutinize these bills after they are reported, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD] has called attention to facts which I believe justify an objection being made to this bill. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CICERO A. HILLIARD

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 478, for the relief of Cicero A. Hilliard.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have an amendment to offer to include the usual form for employees' compensation cases. I suppose that amendment will be accepted.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what were the facts in connection with this injury and whether it really occurred in connection with governmental service? This man was a fourth-class postmaster in the service 12 years and he was injured some time in 1928.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have an amendment—the usual form for employees' compensation cases.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think in this case there should be an amended form authorizing the Compensation Commission to inquire as to whether he really suffered an injury in the service which would entitle him to compensation. Mr. Speaker, for information may we have read the amendment which the gentleman from Colorado proposes to offer?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Clerk will report the amendment for information.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of Cicero A. Hilliard in the same manner and to the same extent as if said Cicero A. Hilliard had made application for the benefits of the employees' compensation act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the approval of this act."

Mr. STAFFORD. I think that will protect the interests of the Government.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the requirements of sections 17 to 20, inclusive, of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby waived in favor of Cicero A. Hilliard, postmaster at Dinsmore, Fla., and the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is authorized and directed to consider and act upon his claim for compensation for injury suffered in the performance of his duties as such postmaster, under the other provisions of such act, as amended; any compensation allowed under this act shall take effect from the date such claim is allowed.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I now offer the amendment.

The Clerk again reported the Eaton amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: In the amendment offered by Mr. EATON of Colorado, insert, after the word "Hilliard" where it occurs the first time, the words "who purports to have suffered injury while employed on or about June, 1925."

The amendment to the substitute amendment was agreed to.

The substitute amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

EDWARD J. O'NEIL

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 433, the bill (H. R. 1203) for the relief of Edward J. O'Neil.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I may say that I asked unanimous consent when this bill and the one following it were called up, that we could return to them later in the afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. O'CONNOR). The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object just to ask one question of the gentleman from New York. In most States $5,000 is the maximum amount payable for wrongful death. In this instance the claimant would have continued to draw money if it had not been for a certain decision which discharged the Railroad Administration from such obligation because of technical grounds that were set up. He had received, up to the time of this decision, $600. At the proper time I want to offer an amendment to make the amount $4,400.

Mr. MEAD. That is perfectly agreeable.

Mr. MOUSER. This would make a total of $5,000, which is the amount payable under the laws of most States.

Mr. MEAD. That is agreeable to me; and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON] has an amendment, and I shall ask him to change the amount to agree with the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. MOUSER. There is a further amendment I would suggest. I think the date and place of this accident should be given so that it can be identified, and I shall offer such an amendment after the gentleman from Alabama has offered his amendment.

Mr. MEAD. I have the date here, and I can put that in the amendment.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I understand this bill the claimant would have no right against the railroad administration were it not for a mistake of law on the part of the State compensation commission.

Mr. MEAD. No; that is not it at all. The railroad administration agreed to these claims and the State compensation commission was paying the claimants. The State commission discontinued payments in both cases after a decision rendered by the appellate division of the State court. This was the Snow decision, which was instigated by the heirs of the deceased about a year after his death. That case is not identical with these claims which we are considering, for in both these cases awards were approved. There is in the transportation act, I may say to the gentleman, a specific provision that all cases in equity, admiralty, and so forth, not finished or still in progress at the time of the passage of the act, shall not be estopped by the transportation act.

Mr. STAFFORD. If it had not been for that decision, he would have sought his remedy against the railroad company and not against the National Government.

Mr. MEAD. Oh, no; he would have continued to receive his compensation under the direction of the New York State Compensation Commission, which was paid with the approval of the Federal Administrator of Railroads.

Mr. BLACK. As a matter of fact, the Railroad Administration offered to settle for $7,500.

Mr. MEAD. They offered to settle for some $7,500 at one time, and they offered a $5,000 lump-sum settlement in the case of the Beyer claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. Where does that appear in the report?

Mr. MEAD. I have that right here. I do not know whether it is in the report or not.

Mr. STAFFORD. That is the trouble with these reports. They do not give all the facts, and many times objection is based on only part of the facts.

Mr. BLACK. They can not give all the information from the time of Adam to the gentleman. We are trying to economize on the expense of printing, and we know the gentleman will find the facts for himself.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, upon the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD], I withdraw my objection, but I will offer the customary attorney's-fee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Edward J. O'Neil, of Buffalo, N. Y., who was injured while in the employ of the United States Railroad Administration on the Erie Railroad.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 5, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$4,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, can the gentleman from New York give me the date and place of the accident?

Mr. MEAD. The date of the accident was March 2, 1918, and the location Buffalo, N. Y., and the railroad was the Erie Railroad Co.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Line 8, after the word "railroad," strike out the comma and insert "March 2, 1918, at Buffalo, N. Y., while employed by the Erie Railroad Co."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BLANCH BROOMFIELD

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 551, an act for the relief of Blanch Broomfield.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object to that bill.

GEORGE BEIER

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Speaker, there was another bill, Calendar No. 434, which was passed over and which was agreed to be taken up later.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report Calendar No. 434.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 1206. A bill for the relief of George Beier.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. Reserving the right to object, in order to get some information from the gentleman from New York. This is a similar case to the one we have just passed. There is no question about the injury in the line of employment, and being given the full compensation under the laws of the State of New York. But, on account of this decision, we have this bill. He has been paid $3,500. I think the same line of reasoning should be had in this case as in the other.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Beier was 60 years of age when this injury occurred. His injury was rated as permanent and total, while in the other case it developed into a permanent and total disability case. Mr. Beier's claim was for $10,000.

The Federal Director of Railroads, through his representative, authorized the payment of $5,000 as a lump-sum settlement in favor of Mr. Beier. This offer Mr. Beier did not accept, because the referee for the State workmen's compensation commission refused to permit him to accept it, for the reason that the referee considered the offer inadequate. The State commission held that the nature of the disability and its permanent character could not be properly compensated in that way and by that amount, so he was given weekly payments of compensation which would have continued until his claim was adequately satisfied.

The compensation commissioner of New York State informs me that this claim was valued at $9,377, less $3,500 paid in weekly payments, or $5,877, and they would not allow the claimant to accept $5,000 as a settlement in full at the time that offer was made. However, in order to pass the measure I am willing to accept a fair compromise.

Mr. MOUSER. I suggest $2,000, in view of the permanent injury of the man, taking into consideration what he has already received. We have to adopt some policy here to be consistent.

Mr. MEAD. In reality this man's claim, I believe, is equally as deserving as the other claim which we just disposed of.

Mr. MOUSER. Yes.

Mr. PATTERSON. Would not the gentleman say $3,000?

Mr. MOUSER. I do not want to argue the amount. I talked to the gentleman from New York [Mr. COOKE] about it, and I think I shall have to insist upon the $2,000.

Mr. MEAD. That will not cover all the expenses this man incurred. I know this man; I have gone to see him a number of times. Two thousand dollars would not pay the medical bills, his board, and other expenses incurred since the time he was taken off the compensation rolls.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman realizes, in view of the decision, this is purely a moral obligation and not a legal one.

Mr. MEAD. Absolutely. Of course, we intended when we passed the transportation act to permit the consideration of just claims, because we specifically stated in that act that they would not be estopped or abated. I wish the gentleman would agree to the suggestion and make it $3,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to George Beier, of Buffalo, N. Y., who was injured June 19, 1919, while in the employ of the United States Railroad Administration on the New York Central Railroad.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MOUSER: Line 5, strike out "$10,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 8, after the word "Railroad," strike out the period, insert a colon and the following: "Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

PURCHASERS OF LOTS IN HARDING TOWNSITE, FLA.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 400, S. 476, for the relief of certain purchasers of lots in Harding Townsite, Fla. If there is to be objection, I trust it will be reserved until I can be heard briefly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 400. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object. I may say to the gentleman that at the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. WOODRUM], who took a special interest in this bill, I had this bill passed over so that I might be able to reexamine it. I have given more than passing attention to it in view of the request of the secretary of Mrs. OWEN, who furnished me with additional matter not incorporated in the report. I suggested to Mr. WOODRUM that I would go over it again before the next meeting.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, we should not have any talk about this bill unless consent is given to return to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to returning to it, but subject to the reservation of objection to the bill itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not press for final consideration until the gentleman from Wisconsin and other gentlemen have had time to further study the matter. In that connection I would like to say briefly that this, in my opinion, is a very meritorious bill. The facts in the case are these. One hundred and twenty-eight lots, approximately, were sold at auction sale during the boom in the vicinity of Miami, Fla., at Harding Townsite.

The Harding Townsite auction sale occurred at Miami Beach, February, 1924. It was advertised and attended by people from many parts of the country. It appears that the auctioneer assured the public that the United States Government stood squarely behind every sale about to be made and was prepared to deliver patent promptly upon payment in full of purchase price. Fine roads and parks were to be developed, which never materialized. It appears no mention was made of possible delays, reservations, exceptions, options, conditions, and so forth. This property was sold at approximately ten times the appraised valuations which the Government had previously put upon it. The unsuspecting public bought at fabulous prices, accepting its Government's promise and contract. Then what happened? It appears that some who paid in full for their lots were refused either title or their money back. Those who tried to resell their lots immediately became liable for heavy damage suits because they could not deliver title, the title the Government had promised but failed to deliver. It appears the Government's first patent was issued August, 1929, five and a half years after the auction sale. By that time this property had suffered from storms, hurricanes, and the general deflation in practically all land values. It is now almost unsalable. These purchasers have been further penalized by a demand for another year's interest in advance on all unpaid balances. They have for eight and a half years made countless and continued effort to secure very belated justice and to overcome departmental rulings, practices, and red tape. Many of these purchasers are now in distress and unable to meet the Government's demands. Even with the passage of this fair and just bill the Government will be $136,000 ahead of its own appraised valuations of this property prior to the time of the auction sale. We feel that 50 per cent of sale price is now a reasonable amount for the purchasers of these lots to pay the Government.

I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. What does the gentleman mean by saying "tentatively sold"?

Mr. GREEN. I am glad the gentleman asked that. The lots were sold for immediate delivery in 1924, but the fact of the matter is that on account of complications and litigation title to lots, if I understand correctly, was not delivered by the Government until about 1929. During this time the persons who had purchased the lots, many of them, desired to resell.

Title, of course, had not been obtained from the Government by auction-sale purchasers; therefore, they could not give title which they had not obtained. To undertake to quit title was to make themselves liable for damage suits. In fact, I believe, some were used because they could not make title to subsequent purchasers.

Meantime the storms and the hurricane and the collapse of the real-estate boom came and, of course, the value of the land dropped.

Mr. GOSS. That applies to other property in that same vicinity, too, does it not?

Mr. GREEN. To some extent. Florida lands are like those in other States. The value is still there, but selling is not so active on account of the general economic conditions. I believe I can safely say that these Harding townsite lots would be well sold by the Government, as suggested, under the provisions of this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BLANCH BROOMFIELD

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 551, for the relief of Blanch Broomfield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that under this bill we are going a long way to conjecture and determine here what killed this man, when one of the statements in the record shows that he suffered from gall-bladder trouble and that the thing from which he died was the outgrowth of gall-bladder trouble, or could have been, as much as anything else. Yet we are trying to say that because he attended this fire, that caused his death. I think it is going a long way.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, this man was called upon by the Indian Service to help in case of a fire, to rescue some Indians. He did so. This occurred on May 1, and on May 5 he died. The doctor certifies that this man did, on a previous occasion, have an attack of gall stones. At the time of the fire the man was in good health, and the doctor says his death was caused four days after the fire, due to the excitement and tension and strain in helping to rescue these Indians. That is the doctor's certificate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

B. & O. MANUFACTURING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 565, for the relief of the B. & O. Manufacturing Co.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FARMERS' GRAIN CO., OF OMAHA

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 942, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to refund to the Farmers' Grain Co., of Omaha, Nebr., income taxes illegally paid to the United States Treasurer.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I will gladly do so.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, this bill asks for the money that this company paid in taxes, through no fault of its own. It was a mistake on behalf of the Treasury. This is merely asking to pay back the company the money that had been paid through error.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIGE. I yield.

Mr. STAFFORD. I believe it was the first day of this Congress when we began consideration of private bills, unobjected to, that the Speaker of the House called attention from the chair to the fact that when he was a member of the Ways and Means Committee there were bills amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars, seeking refund of payment of income taxes, where the Government, in many instances, had no right to retain the money, but claimants had failed to ask for a refund within the statutory period of four years. I have invariably objected to all of these bills. In fact, I have had before the department some bills of similar import, where the department turned them down for that reason. At the present time, and for that reason, I will have to adhere to that position, and I object, Mr. Speaker.

JOHN HERINK

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 943, for the relief of John Herink.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Reserving the right to object.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Has the gentleman read the letter from the department stating that in their estimation this is a legitimate claim?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I have read that letter, and the claim no doubt is legitimate, but the bill is without any limitation whatsoever as to the amount that should be paid to this man. He puts in a claim for $5,455, on the theory that that is the amount of money that he spent. He lists expenditures of a few hundred dollars, having to do with improvements on a homestead. If the gentleman will agree to an amendment limiting the maximum sum that this man may recover to $1,500, which seems to be all that can be figured out of the dollars and cents set forth in the report, and also the regular attorney's fee clause at the end of the bill, I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I wish the gentleman would raise that a little higher than $1,500. Of course, I will be compelled to consent, under the circumstances, to whatever amendment the gentleman desires.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I prefer to be right as well as reasonable in a matter like this if you can state a correct total amount. If the gentleman knows what the exact amount of the damages are and can define that amount, that amount should go in the bill.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I understand that $2,500 is the amount that the Treasury Department would probably allow this man.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. The total amount?

Mr. BALDRIGE. Yes.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that consideration of this bill be postponed temporarily until we can prepare suitable amendments.

Mr. STAFFORD. It can be done right now just as well. I would suggest the following amendment: In line 6, on page 1, strike out "found to be the fair and reasonable value of all improvements" and insert "not in excess of $2,500."

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, there are other items provided for on the second page, and that is why I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over temporarily.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the bill is passed over temporarily.

There was no objection.

W. STANLEY GORSUCH

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1028, for the relief of W. Stanley Gorsuch.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have the author of this bill explain it, or the chairman of the Committee on Claims. It is true this is a small amount, but I would like to hear from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BLACK. It is very plain on the face of it that this man is entitled to relief. He was driving his automobile along the road. A wire cable suspended from an Army airplane struck his car and damaged it to the extent of $45.

Mr. MOUSER. I see where the War Department has recommended it, so I have no objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. Stanley Gorsuch the sum of $45 for damages sustained by him when his automobile was struck on September 17, 1928, by a steel cable depending from an airplane belonging to the Government at or near the Aberdeen Proving Ground in the State of Maryland.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

BARGE "MARY M."

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1216, for the relief of the owner of the barge Mary M.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of William A. Malley, as owner of the barge Mary M., against the United States for damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of a collision between said barge and the U. S. S. Melville, or by reason of the operation of the said steamship Melville, under the control of the Navy Department, on April 15, 1919, at the south end of Governors Island, New York Harbor, may be sued for by said owner of the barge Mary M in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, sitting as a court of admiralty and acting under the rules governing such court, and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine such suit and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of such damages and costs, if any, as shall be found to be due against the United States in favor of said owner of the barge Mary M, or against said owner of the barge Mary M in favor of the United States, upon the same principles and measures of liability as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, and with the same rights of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by the order of said court, and that it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 2, line 5, after the word "costs," insert "but without any allowance for interest prior to the entry of judgment herein."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

NATIONAL BEN FRANKLIN FIRE INSURANCE CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1280, for the relief of the National Ben Franklin Fire Insurance Co.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I object to this claim.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman reserve the objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I reserve the objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman from Colorado acquaint the House as to the reason for the objection, particularly in view of the statement made by the present Secretary of the Treasury that the claim is meritorius and is, therefore, unobjectionable.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Yes. I understand that where insurance companies ask to be reimbursed for moneys they have paid on claims on policies for which they have received a premium, the policy has been to deny the claim. Of course, if the facts in this case are otherwise, the gentleman can point them out.

Mr. BLACK. This is a different situation. The gentleman is speaking of a situation where the Government itself has paid the premium, where the Government was bonded against indemnity, and then the Government is called upon to reimburse the company.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Not at all. I am speaking of insurance companies seeking to recover from the United States moneys paid out on claims against them for which they have been paid premiums for the insurance. Here the insurance company claims indemnity from the Government.

Mr. BLACK. This is a case where the Government itself took a car that belonged to somebody else from whom it was stolen and disposed of it. The Government was not bonded by any insurance company. The owner of the car was insured by the insurance company against theft and the Government was in the position of an innocent receiver of stolen property. It is not a case where the Government is asked to give something back to its own indemnitor; it is an entirely different situation.

Mr. STAFFORD. As stated by the chairman of the Committee on Claims, here is an automobile that is confiscated, appropriated wrongfully by the Government. True, the car was insured and the owner of the car sought reimbursement from the surety company, but the surety company could be subrogated to the rights of the original owner to reclaim the value of the car which was wrongfully appropriated by the Government.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. If those are the facts in the case, they do not appear plainly in the report. Under such circumstances the rightful owner ought to receive the money. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the objection.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $406.29 to National Ben Franklin Fire Insurance Co., in full reimbursement for the sale by the Government of a Buick automobile stolen April 21, 1920, and while operated by the thief for illegal purposes was seized April 26, 1921, forfeited, and sold under the customs revenue laws, and the proceeds converted into the Treasury of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

AMERICAN-LA FRANCE & FOAMITE CORPORATION

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 7330, for the relief of the American-La France & Foamite Corporation, of New York.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I stated in conversation my objections to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STALKER], and I am reserving the objection in order that he may offer us any enlightenment he may care to.

Of course, my objection is to the precedent we will set by taking away the effect of the statute of limitations and thereby permitting thousands of similar claims to be advanced against the Government.

This claim was not made within the statutory period. The claimant was chargeable with knowledge of the law. Ignorance of the law does not excuse. It was not the fault of the Government that he may have had a poor accountant, and although we would like to pay this money we can not afford to establish a precedent that will cause claims involving millions of dollars to be brought against the United States.

I regret I shall be compelled to object, but I reserve the objection for the moment.

Mr. STALKER. I may say to the gentleman from 1917 to April, 1925, inclusive, the Internal Revenue Bureau erroneously and illegally collected from the American-La France Fire Engine Co., a manufacturer of self-propelled fire-fighting apparatus, approximately $850,000 upon the erroneous theory that fire-fighting apparatus constituted automobiles, within the meaning of the excise tax law as contained in the revenue act of 1917, revenue act of 1918, the revenue act of 1921, and the revenue act of 1924.

The United States Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, in the case of American-La France Fire Engine Co. v. Riordan, Collector (6 Fed. Rep., 2d ser., p. 964), held that it was not the intent of Congress to tax fire-fighting apparatus and, therefore, that fire-fighting apparatus was not included within the excise tax laws imposing taxes upon automobiles, automobile trucks, and automobile accessories. The Internal Revenue Bureau accepted the opinion of the circuit court of appeals as good law and returned to claimant—the American-La France & Foamite Co., which is the successor of the American-La France Fire Engine Co.—approximately $700,000, leaving about $150,000 due claimants and not returned.

The Internal Revenue Bureau dealt with fire-fighting apparatus in a series of rulings confusing and wholly inconsistent with each other. The American-La France & Foamite Co., of Elmira, N. Y., is the largest manufacturer of fire-fighting apparatus, and in January, 1918, the Treasury Department ruled that a self-controlled pumping engine being the instrument which actually pumps the water through the hose and on the fire, was not an automobile, but that other fire-fighting apparatus should be classed as automobiles or automobile accessories and taxed at 5 per cent. In May, 1918, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by regulations 44, article 7, announced that articles sold to a State or political subdivision thereof for use in carrying on its governmental operations were not subject to excise taxes. Approximately 90 per cent of the fire-fighting apparatus manufactured by the American-La France Fire Engine Co., and other fire-engine companies, is sold to municipalities, and while this ruling was in force the Internal Revenue Bureau collected taxes only on fire-fighting apparatus sold to individuals, firms, or private corporations, and thereafter the Government in some instances refunded to the American-La France Fire Engine Co. taxes paid under former rulings. Under date of May 5, 1919, regulations 47, construing the revenue act of 1918, was announced, and article 10 of regulations 47 repeated the regulation that articles sold to a State or municipal subdivision thereof by a manufacturer for use in carrying on its governmental operations were not subject to the tax.

In the month of July, 1919, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue promulgated Treasury Decision No. 2897, which reversed the above-mentioned regulations and decisions in regard to sales to States and municipalities, and further provided that such reversal should have a retroactive effect. That thereafter and by Treasury Decision No. 2930, issued October 7, 1919, the Treasury Department again apparently ruled that pumping engines and perhaps other kinds of fire-fighting apparatus were not subject to the excise tax, but this ruling reads as follows:

A self-propelled fire engine, if designed to carry only such persons as are necessary to drive it and to operate the pumping engine, is not taxable.

This ruling was formally published as article 11 of Regulations 47. Such fire-fighting apparatus as was allowed to be taxable was taxed as a pleasure automobile at 5 per cent.

These rulings necessarily resulted in the greatest confusion with respect to what taxes, if any, would be demanded. Conferences were held by representatives of the American-La France Fire Engine Co. with Treasury officials concerning the situation. Then later the Treasury Department notified the American-La France Fire Engine Co. that they were still uncertain with respect to the tax liability of fire-fighting apparatus, and that the whole situation would be reviewed in an additional ruling. In the meantime they were informed that the Internal Revenue Bureau would accept claims in abatement with respect to excise taxes claimed and not paid due to the existing confusion.

Thereafter, and by Treasury Decision No. 2989, issued March 3, 1920, the Internal Revenue Bureau reserved and modified the above ruling, to wit, Treasury Decision 2930, and promulgated articles 11, 12, and 13 of Regulations 47, and ruled therein that all fire-fighting apparatus of every kind and nature should be regarded as automobile trucks and should be taxable at 3 per cent instead of 5 per cent, as in the case of ordinary automobiles. This ruling was made retroactive, and the American-La France Fire Engine Co. was informed that they must now pay excise taxes at the rate of 3 per cent with respect to all sales, whether made to a city, county, State, person, or corporation, and with respect to every kind of fire-fighting apparatus, including pumping engines.

This shows the confused condition in the Treasury Department relating to the collection of excise taxes on fire-fighting apparatus.

This ruling, to wit, articles 11, 12, and 13 of Regulations 47, very seriously affected the finances of all manufacturers of fire-fighting apparatus. The Internal Revenue Bureau, using the ruling as authority, suddenly called for excise taxes now claimed to be due for previous years and months and for periods of time when, according to Internal Revenue Bureau rulings, no taxes were due, and with respect to certain kinds of fire-fighting apparatus, which had not heretofore been taxed. Moreover, this ruling came in a period of great depression and it was very hard to raise money. The result was that some of the smaller manufacturers of fire-fighting apparatus were forced to the wall.

The American-La France Fire Engine Co. was suddenly called upon to pay approximately $340,000 of alleged back excise taxes, when all the time it had been trying to observe Treasury rulings, and it found itself in a very distressing situation. It was only by the curtailment of expenses, the rapid cutting down of inventories, and by resorting very largely to the point of exhaustion of its credit at the banks that the American-La France Fire Engine Co. was able to pay these alleged taxes, which afterwards the United States courts held to be illegally collected.

Each time a tax was paid by the American-La France Fire Engine Co. it protested the tax under oath upon the ground that fire-fighting apparatus could not be regarded as automobiles, and that it was not the intention of Congress to include fire-fighting apparatus when it provided for the excise tax upon automobiles, automobile trucks, and automobile accessories.

Thereupon, the American-La France Fire Engine Co. brought a suit in the Circuit Court of the United States, Western District of New York, to recover sums paid as excise taxes during three of the preceding months. The suit was carried to the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, and by decision No. 159, decided April 6, 1925, the circuit court of appeals held that fire-fighting apparatus could not be classed as automobiles or automobile trucks within the meaning of any of the excise tax laws previously enacted; and that Congress did not intend to tax fire-fighting apparatus, since fire-fighting apparatus was used solely for the purpose of extinguishing fires, and that such apparatus was purchased almost entirely by municipalities or for State purposes.

Thereupon the Treasury Department accepted the above-mentioned decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals, Second Circuit, and proceeded to make refunds with respect to claims filed by the American-La France Fire Engine Co. and other fire-engine companies covering taxes paid by them.

Due to the confusion which necessarily resulted from the action of the Government in promulgating retroactive, conflicting, and inconsistent ruling with respect to fire-fighting apparatus, the American-La France Fire Engine Co. was about 15 days too late in filing refund claims with respect to certain payments of approximately $150,000 made in 1920, and as these claims were not filed within the period of limitations then existing, the Government refused to return to the American-La France Fire Engine Co. approximately $150,000 of the sums which the Government had erroneously and illegally collected, despite the protests duly and emphatically made. I submit, therefore, that since the Government illegally collected the above moneys, when no part of it was due or owing, that in all fairness provisions should be made for the return to the American-La France Fire Engine Co. of the sums to which it is entitled.

Due to the existing depression employment at the factory of the American-La France & Foamite Corporation is low. The company is anxious to return more men to the pay rolls. By passing this bill help would be given at a needed time to a worthy corporation anxious to do its part in restoring business conditions to normal.

This bill should be considered on its merits and passed.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOUSER. I yield.

Mr. BLACK. Of course, a great many of the bills that come to the Claims Committee and to the House come because of some delay on the part of the claimants in living up to the provisions of the law. This is such a case, and I think where the merits generally are so much in favor of the claimant, that the fact there was an oversight or delay in presenting the claim to the right department should be overlooked by the House. We have taken similar action on a great number of occasions on other bills. In this case they protected their rights all the way through up until the time when they should have filed their refund claim.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman from New York, the distinguished chairman of the committee, knows it has been the policy of the House, or at least some of us who give consideration and attention to these bills, to object when the statute of limitations is involved.

Many Members of this House have had equally worthy claims that have been objected to regretfully, at least by me. I see the gentleman's position and the position of the chairman of the committee, but we can not excuse and set the precedent of excusing the failure to pay attention to the legal obligation involved, because if we set such a precedent in connection with this claim, which amounts to $150,000, there will be claims presented amounting to millions of dollars.

Mr. PATTERSON. Let me say to the gentleman that there are $3,000,000 worth of these claims.

Mr. MOUSER. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that other Members have expressed their objection to this bill, so that others have objection to it as well as myself.

Mr. BLACK. I take an entirely different position from the gentleman from Alabama. He says there is $3,000,000 worth of these claims. Is this country running on the credit of $3,000,000 which is due to citizens of the country who have failed to live up to the requirements of the statute of limitations? If so, I think that is a terrible situation. After a long controversy with the Treasury Department it was finally found that this money was due, and I think the merits of the case warrant the payment of the amount carried in the bill.

Mr. MOUSER. At a time like this, when we have just passed a $1,000,000,000 tax bill, we owe some duty to the Government in seeing that failures like that in this case should not be excused, and, as I have said, this particular claim involves $150,000. I regret, but I must object.

Mr. STALKER. The gentleman must appreciate the fact that this claim went through the courts for several years. It is not unusual that they did not file their claim on the day it should have been filed. After going through the various courts it was finally decided that fire apparatus was not subject to this tax.

Mr. MOUSER. There is no way by which a citizen who has a claim against an individual or a corporation can have laches excused. In other words, you have a certain time within which to bring various kinds of causes of action, and just because the Government of the United States is involved here is no reason why we should waive the law.

Mr. BLACK. Except that an individual can not set up the statute of limitations against the Government whereas the Government can plead the statute of limitations.

Mr. MOUSER. If we should permit this claim to go through it would be the duty of this House to grant the same privilege to other claims of a similar nature, involving millions of dollars.

Mr. STALKER. I think that whenever any tax has been collected illegally it should be refunded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOHN HERINK

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 453, S. 943, for the relief of John Herink, for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury, on certification by the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John Herink a sum found to be the fair and reasonable value of all improvements placed by him on lots 1 and 2 and the north half northeast quarter section 30, township 27 north, range 10 east, sixth principal meridian, Nebraska, prior to his eviction therefrom, for which land a patent erroneously issued to him on November 20, 1922, and to return to him the full amount of all money paid by him to the United States in connection with said lands prior to the issuance of such patent: Provided, That as a condition precedent to the certification above mentioned by the Secretary of the Interior to the Secretary of the Treasury the land so patented be reconveyed to the United States free from all claim or right held or claimed under or through the patentee, and the acceptance of such reconveyance shall operate as a restoration of the right of entry under the public land laws to the said Herink, no other objection appearing: Provided further, That he may have the option, in lieu of the payment to him of all money hereinbefore provided, of making entry of other land to the amount of 160 acres under the general homestead law, or 320 acres under the enlarged homestead law, or 640 acres under the stock-raising homestead law, anywhere in the United States where there are public lands subject to such entry, and receiving United States patent for such lands without payment to the United States of any fees, commissions, or other money and without further compliance with the homestead laws in connection therewith and the submission of proof thereof, the patent, however, to contain a reservation of mineral to the United States, if necessary, as in other entries under the same law.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment. Strike out that part of the bill after the word "Herink," line 6, page 1, and from that point down to and including the word "patent" in line 4, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

The sum of $2,500 in full payment of all claims and demands whatsoever against the United States arising out of this claim for the eviction under a patent erroneously issued to him on November 20, 1922.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BALDRIGE: Strike out, beginning on page 1, line 6, after the word "Herink," the remainder of line 6, all of the remainder of page 1 and down to and including the word "patent" in line 4, on page 2, and insert "The sum of $2,500 in full payment of all claims and demands whatsoever against the United States arising out of this claim for the eviction under a patent erroneously issued to him on November 20, 1922."

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BALDRIDGE. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. When we had this matter up for consideration I suggested an amendment whereby the amount that was to be paid was to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior and that it should not be in excess of $2,500. We have no information here as to what the amount of damages to be paid should be, and I thought when the gentleman returned to the consideration of the bill he would offer such an amendment. The gentleman's amendment proposes that the Congress fix the amount. I have no objection to the bill provided we allow the Secretary of the Interior to determine the amount of damages but not in excess of $2,500. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his amendment so as to carry out the original intention.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Let me say that the amendment I have offered was drawn by the gentleman from Colorado, and I thought he was the one who was objecting to the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman will remember I made such a suggestion.

Mr. BALDRIGE. I thought the gentleman objected to the bill because there was no attorney's fee clause in the bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. No; I suggested this very amendment. The gentleman from Colorado suggested that the amount should not be in excess of $1,500, but I suggested $2,500. The bill as it has been introduced provides that the Secretary of the Interior shall determine the amount of damages to be paid, and we should not change that.

Mr. BALDRIGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "found" and insert "determined by the Secretary of the Interior" and in line 7, after the word "improvements" insert "not in excess of $2,500."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STAFFORD: Page 1, line 6, strike out the word "found" and insert the words "determined by the Secretary of the Interior"; and in line 7, after the word "improvements," insert the words "not in excess of $2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the customary attorney's fee provision.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof shall be paid or delivered to or received by any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys, on account of services rendered in connection with said claim. It shall be unlawful for any agent or agents, attorney or attorneys to exact, collect, withhold, or receive any sum of the amount appropriated in this act in excess of 10 per cent thereof on account of services rendered in connection with said claim, any contract to the contrary notwithstanding. Any person violating the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and upon conviction thereof shall be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

CHARLES C. BENNETT

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to the bill (H. R. 5235) for the relief of Charles C. Bennett, Private Calendar No. 191, in the interest of fairness.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. MOUSER. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. We can not enter upon considering returning to prior bills to-day. We may do this at some other session, but I have stated to several Members who have come to me and asked whether I would have any objection to return to bills previously considered that we would not do so.

Mr. MOUSER. I ask this in view of the fact I was the only one who objected to this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. There are half a dozen bills that other Members have objected to, and we should not consider doing this to-day. When we are considering the calendar again we may have an order entered to consider that bill.

Mr. MOUSER. I would like to ask the chairman of the Claims Committee to endeavor to have a day when we can go back and reconsider some of these claims where we may have been in error in objecting to them.

Mr. BLACK. I may say to the gentleman that I expect that we shall have another day to consider these bills in the House, but whether we will have it for the purpose indicated by the gentleman, or not, I do not know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

DONALD K. WARNER

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, if it be not unethical because of my positive knowledge of the proceedings under the Private Calendar, I fear that my request may be misunderstood——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. HOWARD. My request is that the House may be pleased to go back to Calendar No. 433, the bill (S. 241) for the relief of Donald K. Warner, which was considered to-day, and reconsider the bill, objection to which was lodged, I think, under a misapprehension.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to going back, provided the objection stage in the consideration of the bill is not waived.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, we discussed the merits of this bill a while ago. This is the case where the postmaster did not lock his safe and the post office was burglarized.

Mr. HOWARD. Yes; but his failure to do so was because of his sickness from pneumonia at the time.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman will permit, it was his usual practice not to break the combination of the safe, and some person undoubtedly knew of that practice and purloined the contents of the safe.

Mr. HOWARD. The bill has been passed once by the House and twice by the Senate, after severe examination. I am quite sure it is much more meritorious than many similar bills that we have permitted to go through. I feel very earnestly about it. I trust every one of the gentlemen who thinks of objecting will be kind enough to read this young man's splendid and lucid and clear and manly statement regarding the matter, and I am quite sure no objection will be lodged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

NELL MULLEN

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 6410, for the relief of Nell Mullen.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this is one of those cases where I have invariably objected, because the accident occurred through the slippery condition of a post-office floor. It can not be expected that the National Government will pay claims arising out of such a condition, superinduced by the weather. There is no obligation upon the National Government to keep the floors of post-office buildings in an absolutely dry condition against the elements. I have objected to all similar bills.

Mr. MOUSER. I hope the gentleman will not object to this because he may have objected to other bills. I have great admiration for the gentleman's ability and for his knowledge of the law. The gentleman seems to have objected to these bills, where serious injury has occurred to some one because of falling down steps or falling in the interior of a building, on account of the slippery condition during a time of inclement weather, on the ground that it is an act of God, and therefore the Government is not responsible.

The Government owes a duty to the public that it invites there to transact business, to see that marble floors, which are naturally more slippery when wet than other material, are kept in a reasonably safe condition. I think this is the law, and I believe this can be distinguished from any ordinary act of God. Here is a case where a person was injured because she slipped on this marble floor and fell. The Government has janitors and other help; why can they not put down some sawdust or some salt or some other material, so that people will not keep on injuring themselves under such circumstances. During this session of the Congress we have had case after case where people have been injured in post-office buildings under such circumstances; and I think there is an obligation, legally, on the part of the Government, and I believe, in fact, I know from experience, that a person could sue in a civil court and obtain judgment under such conditions. There are any number of cases where people fall upon a sidewalk because the owner of a store, for instance, is negligent in not keeping the sidewalk in a safe condition for people to pass over it, on account of inclement weather; and such owners are liable for such accidents.

Mr. EATON of Colorado. I want to direct the attention of gentlemen to the difference between the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, and what this case really is as I see it. The gentleman from Ohio is talking about actions where there is negligence on the part of the property owner or some one else. In this case, in the report, there is not a word of any type of negligence; there is simply a statement that the floor was slippery. It is simply a case of an accident. They have not shown any negligence to bring the case within the right to recover in a court of law.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman is a lawyer, and does not he think that the allegation, to the effect that they negligently permitted the floor to become in a slippery condition, without taking any pains to remedy it, would be such an allegation of negligence that it might be so held in a civil court?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Not without some facts to show negligence.

Mr. MOUSER. The facts are stated in the report.

Mr. STAFFORD. I would reply to the gentleman's statement, but I wish to give the gentleman from Pennsylvania his innings in justification of this bill.

Mr. MOUSER. Does not the gentleman think——

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman is in error as to his statement about the liability of owners in keeping sidewalks in proper condition. That only applies where the municipality has put into effect an ordinance requiring abutting property owners to keep the sidewalks in a safe condition, but there is no liability on the owner of property per se for damages by reason of an act of God.

Mr. BLACK. This was not an act of God.

Mr. STAFFORD. This great protector of the Treasury would have the Government keep every floor in every post office dry. This wet condition was brought about by the falling of snow and people coming in and tracking it over the floor.

Mr. BOLAND. Mr. Speaker, I am sorry my bill has got into a wet discussion. However, I believe the gentleman from Wisconsin misinterpreted, as far as the law of Pennsylvania is concerned. The law of Pennsylvania states quite specifically that property owners have to have their sidewalks clear so that they are passable. Even the slightest uprising or uplift of the sidewalk for a pedestrian to trip over, a rising flagstone, makes the owner of the property liable for damages. I am talking from a contractor's standpoint. In building a building in Pennsylvania we have to build a structure in such a manner that no pedestrian can be injured; and if he is, the contractor is liable.

Only where there is contributory negligence on the part of the pedestrian is the contractor or owner exempt. In this bill there is no such contributory negligence and the lady mentioned in the bill is entitled to the full claim.

Miss Mullen is a very high-class lady and has suffered much because of this accident which occurred at the post office in the city of Scranton, Pa. It does seem unreasonable that any Member of Congress would object to such a deserving measure, one so full of merit. If this Congress wishes to do justice it will pass favorably upon this bill.

This was not an act of God, it was inside the post office, admitted by the post-office inspector, admitted by the postmaster himself, admitted by the superintendent of mails that the accident occurred there. This lady, eight years ago, had her leg broken, was in the hospital five weeks, had 37 treatments after she got out of the hospital, suffered all this damage and hardship through an accident caused by a slippery floor. All this could have been avoided if sawdust had been placed on the floor, so as to protect patrons.

Mr. STAFFORD. Of course, if the department had placed sawdust there it might have contributed to the accident. But the Government is not liable if patrons come in and make a sloshy condition on the interior floor. I object.

EXEMPTION FROM TAX PAYMENT BY STATE

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Ways and Means on House Joint Resolution 439, to amend the revenue act of 1932.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report will be referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union and ordered printed.

Mr. RAGON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House Joint Resolution 439, and that we may consider it in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object until I have heard the resolution read, and subject then to some explanation by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

[House Report No. 1695, Seventy-second Congress, first session]

AMENDMENT TO REVENUE ACT OF 1932

Mr. RAGON, from the Committee on Ways and Means, submitted the following report (to accompany H. J. Res. 439):

The Committee on Ways and Means, to whom was referred the resolution (H. J. Res. 439) to amend section 621 (a) of the revenue act of 1932, having had the same under consideration, report it back to the House without amendment and recommend that the resolution do pass.

The purpose of this resolution is to secure to States or subdivisions thereof complete exemption from any excise taxes imposed by the revenue act of 1932. Under the Constitution States or subdivisions thereof are exempt from a tax on purchases made direct from a manufacturer or producer, and the Treasury Department has promulgated regulations providing for such exemption. However, where a purchase is made by a State or subdivision thereof from any person other than a manufacturer or producer under the revenue act of 1932 the tax would apply. This resolution would permit of a refund of the tax paid by a State or subdivision thereof on any purchase made of any dealer other than a manufacturer or producer and thereby carry out the original intent of the Congress in the passage of the revenue act of 1932.

In compliance with paragraph 2a of Rule XIII of the Rules of the House of Representatives, the change in existing law made by the joint resolution is shown as follows: New matter proposed to be added to section 621 (a) of the revenue act of 1932 is printed in italic; section 621 (a) as now constituted is shown in roman.

SEC. 621. CREDITS AND REFUNDS

(a) A credit against tax under this title, or a refund, may be allowed or made—

(1) To a manufacturer or producer, in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to the sale of any article (other than a tire or inner tube) purchased by him and used by him as material in the manufacture or production of, or as a component part of, an article with respect to which tax under this title has been paid, or which has been sold free of tax by virtue of section 620, relating to sales of articles for further manufacture.

(2) To any person who has paid tax under this title with respect to an article, when the price on which the tax was based is readjusted by reason of return or repossession of the article or a covering or container, or by a bona fide discount, rebate, or allowance; in the amount of that part of the tax proportionate to the part of the price which is refunded or credited.

(3) To a State or political subdivision thereof, in the amount of any tax under this title which has been paid with respect to the sale of any article purchased by it for use solely in the exercise of an essential governmental function.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the House joint resolution.

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. As I understand it, this is an administration measure. It is necessary for the proper administration of the tax law, and it has been considered by the Ways and Means Committee and has the unanimous report of that committee. It is brought up at this time because of the necessity for action in connection with the administration of the law.

Mr. RAGON. That is correct.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman explain briefly and in particular whether the administration of this new provision is capable of abuse in escaping taxes?

Mr. RAGON. I hardly think so. Of course, the Treasury will surround that with regulations I think we could well feel confident would protect the Government in every respect. Their idea is that it refers only to those sales to the States or subdivisions thereof which are made by those other than the producer or manufacturer. If it is made directly from the producer and manufacturer, of course, the State does not pay any tax.

Mr. STAFFORD. Assume a municipality is engaged in a private venture. Would the municipality still be excepted from the payment of the tax?

Mr. RAGON. No; this applies only to the subdivisions of the State and the States when they are engaged in essentially governmental functions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, this matter has had the consideration of the committee and, so far as the members of the minority are concerned, we heartily approve of the passage of the resolution. Personally I regret very much that there is occasion to bring up at this time further amendments to the act that we passed a week or two ago. I am sure that this will constitute no precedent for that sort of action. Of course, such an extended bill as a tax measure naturally will bring up questions of administration and matters of error. No bill of that size or kind could ever be written by human ingenuity without finding some defects in it in the course of putting it into practice. Therefore I feel particularly anxious not only that this resolution be adopted at this time, because it is meritorious, but that in addition thereto it shall not set a precedent for further amendments being brought forward either by Members of the House or by members of the Ways and Means Committee, unless there is found to be some very pressing emergency. I think the majority will have the assistance of the minority to carry out that idea.

Mr. BRIGGS. As I understand, it was not contemplated that this tax should be applicable originally in this way. Is not that correct?

Mr. TREADWAY. I think so. I think it was one of those things unknown or not discovered at the time of the actual writing of the bill. Eventually authorities in municipalities found this possible loophole and wanted to have it corrected. It is, we might say, a clerical correction that has the support of the administration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL GUARDIAN OF NICK VASILZEVIC

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to Calendar No. 430 (H. R. 1780), for the relief of the legal guardian of Nick Vasilzevic.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I have no objection to returning to the bill, subject to the objection to the consideration of the bill itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS]. Has the gentleman withdrawn his objection to this bill?

Mr. COLLINS. I was assured by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SCHAFER] that the wine on the floor which the prohibition officers were alleged to have poured there was directly responsible for this accident. I do not want to do an injustice. Therefore I told him if the bill came up again I would withdraw my objection.

Mr. MOUSER. I can not understand the gentleman's consistency, when he objects to somebody falling on the floor where there is snow, but where there is wine on the floor it becomes a different matter.

Mr. SCHAFER. Federal prohibition agents of the Government were responsible for pouring the wine on the floor.

Mr. STAFFORD. If the gentleman from Ohio had followed my argument closely enough, he would have known that I stated if they had poured sawdust on the floor and the sawdust was a contributing factor——

Mr. MOUSER. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman forces the issue, I shall have to object.

RIPARIAN OWNERS, MUD LAKE BOTTOM, MINNESOTA

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 8219, for the relief of certain riparian owners for losses sustained by them on the drained Mud Lake bottom in Marshall County, in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. BACHMANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BURTNESS. Does the gentleman really intend to object, regardless of the merits? I do not want to waste time, but I want to assist the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG], who is not feeling well to-day, with regard to his very meritorious bill, but if the gentleman has foreclosed his mind, there is no use taking up the time of the House.

Mr. BACHMAN. I reserve the right to object, if the gentleman wants to add anything with respect to the merits of the claim.

Mr. BURTNESS. If the gentleman's mind is open, I would like to explain it.

Mr. BACHMANN. I will say that I am pretty well convinced that this bill ought not to pass at this time.

Mr. NOLAN. Will the gentleman reserve the right to object long enough to offer some amendments?

Mr. BURTNESS. While the gentleman is reserving the right to object, I want to call attention to the fact that the recommendation of the department, while adverse as it appears in the printed report, has been supplemented by a second report based upon the amendments agreed to in committee to which the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NOLAN] refers, which, however, is not included in the printed report available to Members. Typewritten copies are available. The gentleman from West Virginia is a good lawyer and therefore knows that land adjoining a meandered lake, as the water recedes, belongs to the riparian owners. Now, the claim embodied in this legislation is made for the reason that along about 1912 the Attorney General of the United States made an erroneous report to the Interior Department and held that this land that had been created there because of the recession of the water in Mud Lake belonged to the Government of the United States. I can not conceive how any competent attorney who had investigated the authorities could make that sort of a recommendation to the Interior Department; but, however, it was made, and the Interior Department in turn threw these lands open to homestead entry. What was the result? Homesteaders went in there and filed upon the land. Backed by Federal authorities, they took it away from the rightful owners, the riparian owners. Those homesteaders had the entire power of the Federal Government behind them. The lawful owners were deprived of the use of their land. They had to take the matter into court. They had to carry their case through all of the Federal courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, at a tremendous expense, and finally, after they had been deprived of their land for more than 10 years, the Supreme Court of the United States held they were entitled to the possession thereof, as it was their legal property. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SELVIG] is the author of the bill. The land is not in my district and does not concern me; but all this bill provides is to grant to these people who were forced into court, who were deprived of the use of their property, the modest sum of from 60 cents to a dollar an acre as the annual rental value of the land during that period of about 10 years, a period, by the way, when they were not only under tremendous expense in handling the litigation through all the Federal courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, but during a time when farm products could be raised and sold at reasonable prices.

The rental suggested by the committee as a fair compromise in this bill is exceedingly low and modest, and I am sure the gentlemen will not object to the bill if they understand it.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTNESS. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. Did this lake dry up, or was the water drained off?

Mr. BURTNESS. It dried up, in part, and was also drained, if I remember correctly. The gentleman from Minnesota can answer that more definitely. I think it was partly drained and partly dried up.

Mr. GOSS. I would like to have that question answered, because it may involve a lot of other claims.

Mr. BACHMANN. Absolutely. It involves a lot of other claims that are to follow. The department report reads:

> The value of the land could not be determined without an investigation in the field, but it appears from previous reports of examiners of this office that Mud Lake bottom lands were never effectively reclaimed and are still subject to overflow.

Now, there is a continuing proposition. Congress did pass a bill in 1928 to take care of some of these.

Mr. BURTNESS. Oh, no; not these people. That is the peculiar part of it. Congress passed a bill in 1928 which took care of the homesteaders who had gone in there and expended money under Government authority—men who were in there illegally—while the Congress has not taken care of the people who were the legal owners of the land and who were deprived of its use and occupation, solely because of a mistake made by the Department of Justice in rendering an illegal and unjustified decision to the Interior Department, which opened it to homestead entry.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BACHMANN. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. If it be true that this decision is erroneous, will this not throw open thousands of claims in my State where the Government has sold the riparian rights on hundreds of lakes?

Mr. BURTNESS. I do not know anything about the situation in the gentleman's State. This case stands upon its own merits. These people had to litigate these matters against the Federal Government. They had to pay their own expenses. The Supreme Court of the United States sustained the owners in their claims, but, of course, during that time the strong arm of the Government was in there holding the lands by force, against the lawful owners who were thus illegally deprived of its use. All this bill provides is a modest sum as rental, in law the mesne profits for its use and occupation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GOSS. Reserving the right to object, I would like to find out just what happened in this Mud Lake; whether it was drained or whether it dried up, because it will affect future claims.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mud Lake was drained by the riparian owners, and when the lake was drained the Government threw the land open to settlement.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman means the people who are now asking for this claim had the lake drained?

Mr. BACHMANN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Is that correct?

Mr. BURTNESS. Yes; that is by the local authorities; and these people whose lands were benefited paid for it.

Mr. BACHMANN. The report shows to the contrary. The report shows, by the decision of the court, Mud Lake has never been effectively drained and never will be until some adequate system of drainage is provided for that purpose.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me say to the gentleman that in the case of an excessively wet year Mud Lake would be troubled with overflows.

Mr. BURTNESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOSS. I yield.

Mr. BURTNESS. We are not concerned here with what may happen in the future or what the drainage works are. These people now have their lands back. They can use them for whatever they like. All this bill does is to grant compensation to cover the 10-year period concerning which the committee had testimony, during which time big crops were raised on the land by the people who were there as homesteaders under the alleged rights given them by the Government, but who were, as a matter of law, trespassers.

Mr. GOSS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact there are two lakes I am familiar with at Seattle, Wash., that are under this same situation, with a lot of mills and other owners who may come in with claims.

Mr. BURTNESS. Not unless the Federal Government makes an erroneous decision as it did in this case and puts the property owners to tremendous expense to protect their rights, and to get their property back.

Mr. GOSS. It was stated a moment ago that the riparian owners wanted this drained. That makes a difference.

Mr. BURTNESS. It was their land. They had a perfect right to cut a ditch and drain it if they wanted to.

If they drained it to use it, then the Government ought not to have taken it from them, but when it did it should pay the amount suggested by the committee as fair compensation to reimburse them for the use and occupation of which they were illegally deprived.

Mr. KNUTSON. Let me say to the gentlemen of the committee that the error was made in holding that this lake was navigable water, when as a matter of fact it was not a navigable body of water.

Mr. GOSS. They could cut a connecting canal between this lake and another lake or river.

Mr. KNUTSON. A drainage ditch.

Mr. BURTNESS. But you would not call a small ditch a navigable stream. That, however, is immaterial.

Mr. GOSS. But ditches have been dredged to make them canals and to make them navigable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BACHMANN and Mr. GRISWOLD objected.

OCTAVIA GULICK STONE

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 9331, for the relief of Octavia Gulick Stone.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a patent in fee to Octavia Gulick Stone, Blackfeet allottee No. 2133, for land allotted to her under the provisions of the act of June 30, 1919 (41 Stat. L. 3–16), and designated as homestead.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "issue," insert the words "upon her application."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

OSCAR R. HAHNEL

The Clerk called the next bill, H. R. 5561, for the relief of Oscar R. Hahnel.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this car was worth in 1924, at the time it was bought, $1,735. The collision occurred in 1927, when the car, according to the Blue Book, had a value of $500. They claim $500 damages, but the car is still in use after a repair bill, shown in the report, of $71.33.

I do not want to be unreasonable. I want the claimant to have what is just, but I think $500 is out of reason for a car which has a market value of $500, that is still in use, and only cost $71.33 to put in use.

Mr. PARTRIDGE. The War Department estimated the cost of repairs at $500, and the $71.33, I understand, was what it actually cost this man to put it into running condition so he could use the car at all. This amount did not put it back in the condition it was before the accident.

Mr. GRISWOLD. The War Department estimated the repairs, as I understand it, at over $500, and said that that was not even the limit of the damages, yet, as a matter of fact, the car in 1927 was only worth $500 according to the report.

I am agreeable to the bill if the author will reduce the amount of the claim.

Mr. PARTRIDGE. What amount would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I think $300 would be a reasonable amount.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Oscar R. Hahnel the sum of $981.02, to reimburse him for damages to his automobile caused by a collision with an Army truck near Bretton Woods, N. H., on August 10, 1927.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 1, line 6, strike out "$981.02" and insert "$500."

Mr. PARTRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PARTRIDGE to the committee amendment: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$500" and insert in lieu thereof "$300."

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed; and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

MEMORIAL TO WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate Joint Resolution 182, amending the joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, of a memorial to William Jennings Bryan, and pass the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, let the resolution be reported, please.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That section 3 of the joint resolution authorizing the erection on the public grounds in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, of a memorial to William Jennings Bryan be, and the same is hereby, amended by striking out the words

"or Potomac Park" appearing in the second line of said section, so that section 3, when amended, shall read as follows:

"SEC. 3. The memorial herein provided for shall not be erected or placed in any part of the Mall, nor on any ground within one-half mile of the Capitol."

Mr. RAINEY. I will say in explanation of the resolution that this meets with the approval of the Fine Arts Commission and of the Bryan Monument Association.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. Has the site been selected on which this monument will be erected?

Mr. RAINEY. No. They simply do not want it in the Mall. It possibly may be erected in Potomac Park but not in the Mall.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman says it may be placed in Potomac Park. As I caught the reading of the resolution I think Potomac Park is excluded, and I was wondering where they intended to place it. I thought a site had been selected.

Mr. RAINEY. A site was selected, but it has been abandoned. They have selected some other place which is satisfactory to everybody interested.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is the gentleman sure it is going to be in the District of Columbia?

Mr. RAINEY. I am.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

R. B. MILLER

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 159, for the relief of R. B. Miller.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I can not see any reason why we should reimburse this person in the amount stated in the bill. I object.

SUN SHIPBUILDING & DRY DOCK CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 250, authorizing adjustment of the claim of the Sun Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Comptroller General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to settle and adjust the claim of the Sun Shipbuilding & Dry Dock Co. arising from the use of its Pier No. 4 on June 21, 22, and 23, 1930, by the Government, and to allow in full and final settlement of said claim not to exceed the sum of $110. There is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $110, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay said claim.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider laid on the table.

FRANCIS B. KENNEDY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 253, authorizing adjustment of the claim of Francis B. Kennedy.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the author of the bill or of the chairman of the committee what the law or procedure would have been to reimburse this special agent if he had actually purchased this liquor and these bootleggers had gotten the money because of the purchase instead of robbing him?

Mr. BLACK. Probably the regular procedure would have been that he would have gotten the liquor, sold the liquor, and made a profit. However, that was not the situation here. This man was a special agent called in on the narcotic situation. He had these funds on his person, and instead of being able to arrest the narcotic violators he was stuck up by some underworld characters, and they took his money away. That is the way I read this bill.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee does not bear out the report to the extent that this man went there with the intention of purchasing 50 gallons of alcohol at $7 a gallon, instead of narcotics.

Mr. LAMNECK. Was he a Government agent?

Mr. GRISWOLD. Yes. He went there to trap these bootleggers, but instead of trapping them and getting the liquor they robbed him of $350. Mr. Speaker, I object.

MILBURN KNAPP

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 971, for the relief of Milburn Knapp.

Mr. MOUSER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. HADLEY. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MOUSER. Certainly.

Mr. HADLEY. I am surprised that objection is made. I will ask the gentleman if he has read the report in this case and the proceedings contained in the record.

Mr. MOUSER. I have read the report of the Claims Committee.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman reserves his objection. I desire to make a brief statement about this case because I have sat here during the day and heard the proceedings. If there is an equitable bill that has been acted upon here today it is no more so than this bill.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman give a résumé of the facts in this case so that we may have the picture before us?

Mr. HADLEY. I will attempt to do so. The circumstances are these: The claim is founded on transactions which occurred in the State of Oregon. The claimant is a resident of my State now and my congressional district. The case was brought to my attention while the bill was pending in the Senate and I have followed it. Briefly, it is this: This claimant entered into a contract with the United States Government for the cutting and removal of certain timber on the Klamath Indian Reservation in the State of Oregon in the year 1913. He also negotiated with representatives of the Indian Bureau and the Forest Service for the use of the Williamson River which flows across that reservation. It was necessary to use the Williamson River to float the logs down to the mill erected on lands adjacent to the timber which he had leased from the Government. That was well understood by everybody concerned. He negotiated with subordinate officers of the department involved, which was the Interior Department, for the use of the Williamson River. It was always understood he was to use the river and the record clearly shows that. However, when the contract was made it did not stipulate the use of the Williamson River. That is a material point.

Mr. MOUSER. Very.

Mr. HADLEY. However, if we were proceeding here on strictly legal principles in a court of law, that would be far more material than it is here, but on principles of equity and justice the matter has been entirely resolved by findings of the Court of Claims. The Department of the Interior, the Secretary himself, revoked the permit which had been granted after this claimant had gone into operation under his contract and contemporary understanding and erected a mill at large expense. Following the permission he had from the department some gentlemen from San Francisco came upon the land. They were on a vacation. They came to the conclusion that the waters of the river were being polluted or would be by the use of the stream in this way, that it would not be conducive to the fish nursery, and that it was injurious to the fish. They protested to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary of the Interior, without any investigation whatever, I understand, wired back and announced a revocation of this permit immediately upon the protest on these men from San Francisco, without any opportunity on the part of this man, the claimant, to make any remonstrance or protest of any kind. However, later on, upon his remonstrance, the Secretary of the Interior modified his revocation to the extent of permitting him to use the stream for the purpose of floating the logs that had been cut and that were on the banks of the stream, but no further permission was granted.

He sued in the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims entered findings and held that the jurisdiction was not adequate in the court to cover this matter; that is, there had been no breach of a Government contract, because the contract itself had not in terms stipulated for the use of the Williamson River.

Mr. MOUSER. If the gentleman will yield right there, they also found that the claimant here had not protected his rights by having any stipulation in the contract about the use of the river.

Mr. HADLEY. But the circumstances are that the gentlemen with whom the negotiations had been had on behalf of the department, representatives of the Indian Bureau and representatives of the forest area involved—all these gentlemen had protested to the Secretary.

Mr. MOUSER. But the gentleman does not claim that this Indian agent had any authority from the Secretary of the Interior to enter into an oral contract of this kind. The Court of Claims so held and the Interior Department recommends against the gentleman's claim.

Mr. HADLEY. No; the Interior Department recommends absolutely in favor of the claim. I am sure the gentleman has not read this record. He has only to turn to the fifth page of the report——

Mr. MOUSER. I must say I had not remembered that. I can not agree, however, with the Interior Department, in the face of the decision of the Court of Claims, in recommending such a claim against the Government where the claimant was so negligent about a contract involving this amount of lumber that was to be floated down the river, and not protecting himself by having a contract in writing, but simply going upon the mere oral or verbal statement of a man who was not authorized by the Secretary of the Interior to make such an agreement.

Mr. HADLEY. The gentleman will remember we are now in a forum of equity.

Mr. MOUSER. Yes; but there must be some obligation——

Mr. HADLEY. And the gentleman has not permitted me to complete my statement.

Mr. MOUSER. I want the gentleman to make a statement, because this is an important claim. It involves a claim of $16,000 against the Government.

Mr. HADLEY. Yes; it is important. Let me say to the gentleman that this poor old man is now broken, disheartened, and discouraged on account of this action on the part of the Government, and the findings of the Court of Claims show there is equity in the matter on page 3 of this report.

However, I want to go back to the point the gentleman raised about the attitude of the Interior Department itself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman intends to object——

Mr. HADLEY. How can the gentleman understand this case if he has not knowledge that the Interior Department has approved the claim?

Mr. MOUSER. I want the gentleman to have time to give a full explanation. I am always open to conviction, but the gentleman has not met my objection as to there being no right given to use the river where such right might interfere with public rights. Citizens had the right to fish in this river. It was a public stream. They had the right to object to the Secretary of the Interior if it was being used for a purpose not in keeping with the use that should have been granted.

Mr. BUTLER. If the gentleman will permit, the citizens did not have that right. This was on an Indian reservation entirely and was under the jurisdiction of the Indian Bureau.

Mr. MOUSER. Then the logger had no right to go in there and float logs down the stream, so far as the rights of the Indians were concerned.

Mr. BUTLER. But he had a permit that was of sufficient dignity and force and effect that the Secretary of the Interior, in order to get rid of him, had to actually issue an order revoking it. This in itself shows he went on there with the authority and permission of the Indian Bureau and incurred this big expense, and as a result of this he completely broke himself financially.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman knows that every permit given by the Government is subject to revocation, and this claimant knew that. Now we are asked for damages when the revocation was regularly made.

Mr. BUTLER. If the fact was that the Government gave a permit and induced the man in that way to expend every dollar he had, ought he not to be reimbursed?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill may be passed over without prejudice for the time being.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GERMAINE M. FINLEY

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1338, for the relief of Germaine M. Finley.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GLOVER). Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

COPPER RIDGE MINING CO.

The Clerk called the next bill, S. 1436, for the relief of the Copper Ridge Mining Co.

There being no objection, the Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to pay to the Copper Ridge Mining Co., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $515, in full satisfaction of the claims of said company against the United States for repayment of purchase money in connection with mineral entries Phoenix 056018 and 056019, such claims for repayment not having been submitted to the General Land Office within the time required by the act entitled "An act to amend an act approved March 26, 1908, entitled 'An act to provide for the repayment of certain commissions, excess payments, and purchase moneys paid under the public land laws,'" approved December 11, 1919.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

J. D. STEWART

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 3119, for the relief of J. D. Stewart.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I have an amendment as a substitute, which I will offer later.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 17 and 20 of the act entitled "An act to provide compensation for employees of the United States suffering injuries while in the performance of their duties, and for other purposes," approved September 7, 1916, as amended, are hereby, waived in favor of J. D. Stewart, a rural carrier out of Edison, Ga., who was injured April 17, 1926.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of J. D. Stewart, who purports to have suffered an injury while employed as a rural carrier about April 17, 1929, in the same manner and to the same extent as if the said J. D. Stewart had made application for the benefits of said act within the period required sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefits shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NELLIE M'MULLEN

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, S. 3538, an act for the relief of Nellie McMullen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. EATON of Colorado. Reserving the right to object, I have a similar amendment to this bill.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I doubt if this bill should pass. This carrier died, but there is no evidence that he was injured and died because of injuries. The widow wants to be compensated because her husband has died. I can not see without a proper showing that the man was injured while in the service of the Government that there is a claim against the United States.

Mr. BLACK. The only reason that this is here is because the claim was not filed before the statute ran against it. The medical record shows that this man died of dilation of the heart, caused by excessive exertion in the rural mail service.

Mr. COLLINS. The Postmaster General says that there is nothing in the files of the department to indicate that there is any unusual features connected with the death of this man that would entitle his widow to any special consideration.

Mr. BLACK. The medical record shows that this man was in line of duty trying to get out of a mudhole on his route delivering mail, and brought on his heart condition which resulted in his death.

Mr. COLLINS. The Postmaster General also says if this bill passes a precedent would be established for the filing of such claims in the case of every carrier who died leaving a widow, and an avalanche of requests for similar action will result, not only from widows of rural carriers but from widows of other postal employees.

Mr. BLACK. The widow of this man did not know that she was required to go before the Compensation Commission and make out a case, and that if that was not done she would be foreclosed. The postmaster thought he had no requirements to do that sort of thing.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I shall have to object.

CHARLESTOWN SAND & GRAVEL CO.

The Clerk read the next bill on the Private Calendar, H. R. 2214, for the relief of the Charlestown Sand & Stone Co., of Elkton, Md.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MOUSER. I will reserve an objection.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. Speaker, in this case the Elkton Sand & Stone Co. is really A. Ralph Andrews, who owns all the stock except a few shares.

In 1917 he entered into a contract with the board of engineers for sand, gravel, and materials to be furnished for Fort Salisbury, in Delaware. On January 1 the Government took over the railroads. The Government in April and again in June increased freight rates. Subsequent to that the Government, through condemnation proceedings, took over his plant. His plant had a capacity of about 5 tons a day, and the Government loaded it up to 18 or 20 tons a day and destroyed the plant. This part of it is to my own knowledge, because it is near my home. Not only did they do that but the refuse, instead of being distributed in the ordinary dump, was placed on good sand and gravel. All the facts were submitted to the committee. The committee was of opinion he was entitled to compensation because of all this damage, but the committee stripped the thing down to increased freight rates. I call the gentleman's attention to this fact. Shortly after this contract was entered into, both the Army and the Navy put into their contract a clause that in case there was any increase of freight rates, that should be added to the cost of the contract. I have a copy here of one of the contracts to be used in the case of coal. Here are the standard Government purchasing conditions on coal. It provides that the purchase price of coal, if inclusive of freight charges, from the point of shipment, named, is based upon the freight rate in effect on the date of the opening of the bid, and that any increase or decrease in such freight rates shall correspondingly increase or decrease the purchasing price of coal or any tonnage shipped thereafter. That was a standard clause put in all of these contracts shortly after this contract was made.

Mr. MOUSER. The gentleman understands, of course, that the War Department has objected to this claim upon the ground that the contract was entered into after the declaration of war, and that he should in giving his estimate have taken into consideration probable increase in freight and materials because of war. Now, after practically 12 years this man is here asking the Government to pay him $12,365.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. In the Seventieth Congress the bill passed both Houses, and I have a letter here from the Clerk of the Senate in my files, in which he states that the only reason it was not sent to the President was because they overlooked sending the bill back to the House.

Mr. MOUSER. If the Government should take care of every contractor who suffered because of the rising cost of materials and labor during the war on Government buildings, and so forth, there would be no end to these claims against the United States Government. The contractor should have used the same judgment in estimating the cost in submitting his bids.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is an unreasonable statement. The gentleman will pardon me, but I think I know more about this claim than he has had opportunity to find out. I say to you that the freight rate is a small percentage of his loss. When the Government took over his plant arbitrarily by condemnation, they overloaded it about three times and destroyed the plant, and the report shows that the overcharges because of the additional expense involved in connection with the operation was over $6,000.

Mr. MOUSER. That is just one of many thousands of claims. Before the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds there were many contractors who came in and wanted more money on post offices that they had built.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. That is not a fair statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. I object.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. STAFFORD. Certainly.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. This bill was considered carefully by the Seventieth Congress and was passed. I was on the subcommittee that went into this matter.

Mr. MOUSER. But the gentleman from Wisconsin is going to object to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Oregon. He is not going to object if I explain this to him. We might as well be just about this matter. This bill went through the Seventieth Congress, both Houses, and it was lost over there in the end on its way to the President. We have here a letter from the enrolling clerk in reference to this bill. He states that the bill passed the Senate without amendment on March 21, but in the jam of legislation that was on at that time it was not returned to the House. The bill passed both Houses.

Mr. MOUSER. We have objected to other bills of this kind to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to—

Mr. CHAVEZ, for 10 days, on account of important business.

Mr. SPENCE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, H. R. 1 provided for the full cash payment of the adjusted-service certificates but provided no way for financing the payment, which would have compelled a bond issue to be used for that purpose. H. R. 7726 was introduced, which provided for the payment to be made as follows:

SEC. 2. Payments of the face value of adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes. The Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to have engraved and printed a sufficient amount of Treasury notes, in the denominations of $1, $2, $5, $10, $20, $25, $50, $100, $500, and $1,000 each; such Treasury notes shall be full legal tender, noninterest bearing, exempt from all taxes, including Federal, State, and subdivisions thereof.

The addition of section 2 was the only difference between the two bills.

When the bill H. R. 7726 was considered by the House it was amended by striking out section 2, and the following amendment, which was known as the Owen amendment, inserted in lieu thereof (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 13043):

SEC. 2. Payment of the face value of the adjusted-service certificates under section 509 or 510 of the World War adjusted compensation act, as amended, shall be paid in Treasury notes.

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to issue United States notes to the extent required to make the payments herein authorized. Such notes shall be legal tender for public and private debts and printed in the same size, of the same denominations, and of the same form as Treasury notes, omitting the reference to any Federal reserve bank.

He shall place such notes in the Federal reserve banks, subject to the order of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, to be used for the purposes of this act.

He shall issue a like amount of United States bonds bearing 3½ per cent interest, payable semiannually, with coupons attached, and such bonds shall be due and payable in 20 years from the date of issue, subject to the right of redemption after 10 years.

These bonds shall be deposited in the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, in approximate proportion to their current assets at the date of the passage of this act, and the Federal Reserve Board, by resolution in writing, may direct the sale to the public of such portions of said bonds as it may from time to time desire.

Such currency received for such bonds shall be exchanged for these notes hereby authorized to be issued, and they shall be returned to the Secretary of the Treasury for cancellation.

It will be noticed that both my proposal and the Owen proposal contemplated the distribution of Treasury notes—currency—in pay of the certificates. The argument was made before the Ways and Means Committee that my plan was uncontrolled inflation of the currency. In order to meet and completely answer that charge Senator Robert L. Owen prepared his amendment, which required the issuance of a like amount of United States bonds. The bonds were to be placed with the Federal reserve banks, as the agents of the United States, and would not require the payment of interest until sold. They were not to be sold unless the Federal Reserve Board decided it was necessary to exchange a portion of them for a like portion of the Treasury notes, for cancellation, in order that undue expansion of the currency may be prevented. This amendment permitted expansion of the currency but at the same time the amendment provided for the expansion to be controlled by the Federal Reserve Board, an agency of the Government. There would be no occasion for the sale of the bonds. The amount of money proposed to be issued would not have caused inflation. Therefore the plan did not involve a charge on the Treasury. The bill passed the House in this form.

TREASURY NOTES

The amendment contemplated the issuance and distribution of the same kind of currency that is now outstanding and in daily use—United States notes. The first United States notes were issued during the War between the States; they had no gold behind them at that time, only the credit of the Nation. When General Early was about to take Washington the notes fell in value, below the price of gold. When the war was over and they were made good for all debts—public and private—they immediately became worth 100 cents on the dollar, and have never fallen below that amount. It is true that they are backed at this time by slightly more than 40 per cent gold, $346,000,000 being backed by $156,000,000 in gold. No one is paying interest on this money. It has saved the people a half billion dollars in interest since its issuance. The big bankers do not like this money. They want it withdrawn. They believe that Federal reserve notes should be used instead. Some one is paying interest on the money that is issued by the Federal reserve banks. The Federal reserve system puts up 40 per cent of their depositors' gold—with promissory notes of banks and other forms of eligible paper—and uses the credit of the United States Government to issue Federal reserve notes (currency), which are obligations of the United States; the people (depositors) provide the gold, the Government provides the credit for the issuance of the Federal reserve notes, and the Federal reserve system, privately owned by the bankers, make the money by charging interest on the money so issued; that is the system the bankers want used exclusively.

IDLE GOLD

The testimony before the Ways and Means Committee disclosed that there was sufficient idle gold in the Treasury of the United States to authorize the issuance of more than $2,500,000,000, taking into consideration the policy of our Government to have our paper money backed at all times by 40 per cent gold. It is not the gold standard that is causing us so much trouble, it is the double gold standard. We have twice as much gold behind our paper money as is necessary to have behind it. If something is not done in the near future, the Federal reserve system will syphon this gold out of the Treasury into its own vaults for the purpose of answering the argument we are now making for the expansion of the currency in the manner suggested.

CURRENCY EXPANSION IN RUSSIA AND GERMANY

The argument is made that we should not issue Treasury notes or United States notes, as such a policy will lead to the destruction of our monetary system, as it did in Germany and Russia. These countries deliberately inflated their currencies until it was worthless in order that their debtor classes may pay their debts in cheap money. France and Italy adopted the same policy, but did not go so far, in order to help their debtor classes. England made a step in the same direction in order to help her debtor class. These illustrations are not applicable in this discussion for the reason that we are not proposing uncontrolled inflation, but, on the other hand, advocate controlled expansion. In order that there may be no cause for alarm we are not proposing to issue any more money than we can secure with a 40 per cent gold reserve. The countries that destroyed their currency systems issued money without rega to gold, credit of the nation, or national income. No such proposal is being considered in this country.

EXPANSION OF CURRENCY NECESSARY

It is true that an expansion of the currency to the extent of $2,200,000,000, the amount required to pay the remainder due on the adjusted-service certificates, will cheapen the dollar—not only the particular dollar issued but all dollars, the gold dollar as well—the dollar will probably buy less. That will help solve our greatest problem. Our problem is debts. The people owe $203,000,000,000 in all kinds of debts. The debts were contracted when a dollar would buy much less than it will buy at this time, when one bushel of wheat would pay a dollar of debt, a bale of cotton would pay $100 of debt, but now a bushel of wheat will only pay about one-third of that debt dollar and the cotton dollar will pay about one-fourth of the debt dollar. The people who contracted debts in 1926 are now having to pay those debts with dollars that are worth $2.66. Similar illustrations may be given for all commodities and prices of services. It has the same effect on the people who reside in the cities as it does on the people who produce the commodities.

BETTER A CHEAPENED DOLLAR THAN NO DOLLAR

The people can not pay their debts when there is so much difference between the price of the dollar at this time as compared with the price of the dollar at the time the debts were contracted. We must either cheapen the dollar so people can pay their debts or there will be wholesale bankruptcies and repudiation of debts. The dollar can be cheapened in three ways: (a) The way we propose, which will be controlled expansion; (b) the method adopted by France and Italy, which caused the repudiation of four-fifths of her debts; or (c) the way adopted by Russia and Germany.

I am sure creditors had rather receive a cheapened dollar than no dollar at all. It will be to the interest of the wage earner to receive a dollar that will not buy so much, in return for his labor, rather than not have a job that will permit him to earn a dollar. The dishonest dollar is the one that is now being collected by creditors—a dollar that is worth $2.66 compared with the price of the dollar at the time most of our debts were contracted.

FIAT OR PRINTING PRESS MONEY

Our opponents do not have logic and reason to support their contentions. They have coined phrases that will prejudice the minds of the people. The money we propose to issue is no more printing press or fiat money than any other paper currency that is being issued every day. Billions of dollars in paper currency are issued annually. Let us consider different kinds of paper currency that are now in general circulation and use.

United States notes were first issued in 1862. Total outstanding $346,000,000, protected by the credit of the Nation and a gold reserve of $156,000,000. The difference between the gold reserve and the amount of the notes may be termed fiat money. It is good money because the credit of the Nation is behind it. As the money is torn, worn, or destroyed it is reissued. No one is paying interest on it.

NATIONAL CURRENCY

National banks are permitted to take 2 per cent Government bonds, to the amount of their capital stock, place them with the Secretary of the Treasury, and receive in return therefor the amount of the bonds in new paper money, national currency. The bonds are held as collateral security. The banks receive interest on the bonds in addition to having the use of the money. Not a dollar of gold is required to be behind this money. Total outstanding about $700,000,000. When this money is in general circulation some one is paying the bank of issue interest on it. The Government is also paying the bank of issue interest on the 2 per cent bonds securing the currency. Why not call this fiat or printing-press money? The banks are permitted to use the credit of the Nation to issue money and get pay for using the money issued. The veterans are asking that their Government obligations be used as collateral security for the issuance of money but not asking that they be paid a certain per cent annually for using the money.

GLASS AMENDMENT TO GOLDSBOROUGH BILL

Recently the House passed a bill requiring the Federal Reserve Board to expand currency and credit to the extent that commodity prices will return to the 1926 average. When the bill, H. R. 11499, reached the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency all after the enacting clause was stricken out and a provision was inserted in lieu thereof giving the national banks the right to receive $1,100,000,000 additional currency from the Treasury by securing it with any kind of a Government bond. The amendment contained this language:

> All outstanding bonds of the United States heretofore issued or issued during such period shall be receivable by the Treasurer of the United States as security for the issuance of circulating notes to national banking associations, and upon the deposit with the Treasurer of the United States by a national banking association of any such bonds, such association shall be entitled to receive circulating notes in the same manner and to the same extent and subject to the same conditions and limitations now provided by law in the case of 2 per cent gold bonds of the United States bearing the circulation privilege.

The amendment was reported May 3, 1932.

In other words, under the Glass amendment inserted by the Senate committee the bankers of the Nation will be permitted to take 4¼ per cent Liberty bonds, place them with the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of the Treasury will start the printing presses to running and turn out for the bankers the $1,100,000,000 in new money. The bankers will get this new money; it will be national currency, not backed by one penny of gold; will get the use of this money and at the same time they will receive 4¼ per cent interest on the bonds securing the currency issue. Let us see how it will work out: The bankers will get $42,750,000 interest annually on the 4¼ per cent bonds securing the currency that will be held by the Secretary of the Treasury; they will pay a tax of one-half of 1 per cent annually on the money issued, amounting to $5,500,000. The bankers will get the use of the money and a net profit of $37,250,000 annually.

EXPLANATION DEMANDED

I want to know why it is sound for the bankers to issue money on the credit of the Nation, and that money is sound money, and it is unsound for money to be issued to the veterans in return for their Government obligations. In the case of the bankers Government obligations are used to secure the issuance of money. It is considered safe and sound. It is not referred to by our opponents as fiat or printing-press money. The use of the Government credit by the bankers has become a racket in which they have a monopoly. If veterans put up $1,100,000,000 in Government obligations or a larger amount to the Secretary of the Treasury as collateral security, why can not the Secretary of the Treasury issue to them the same amount of the same kind of currency that is issued to the bankers? The veterans would not get interest on the certificates deposited as security.

SENATE COMMITTEE

I hope the Senate Committee on Banking and Currency will explain to the country why the bankers should be paid to use the Government credit and the veterans denied the use of the Government credit when the same principle is involved? The veterans are asking that a noncirculating Government obligation be converted into a circulating Government obligation. The conversion can take place without expense to the Government or the people; and, as Senator Owen suggested, "It will be a godsend to the Nation."

FEDERAL RESERVE NOTES

The favorite money of the big bankers is Federal reserve notes. They can call them in when they desire, cause a contraction of the currency and a destruction of values. Some one is paying interest on it. About $3,000,000,000 of this money is now outstanding. The Government has loaned to the bankers its credit in order that this money may be issued as obligations of the United States. This money is used to finance foreigners in transactions between foreign countries, not remotely connected with the United States, except in competition with goods manufactured in the United States.

MONEY QUESTION

When the people understand the money question one of our biggest and most destructive rackets will be destroyed.

The theory that a few should be given special privileges in order that assistance may percolate down to the masses has been exploded. When the plain people are helped, all classes are helped. When they are not prosperous the country is not prosperous. Our Nation's greatness should be measured by the happiness and prosperity of the people who produce the Nation's wealth.

We have the greatest Government on earth. It has been suffering because of neglect and indifference of the people. The people now realize something is wrong; they are looking for the cause; they will find it and a correction will be made. When the people get the truth, our country will be safe and will continue on as the greatest Nation on earth.

When our monetary system is revised in the interest of the people most of our present woes will be eliminated. It is to the interest of the independent banker, merchant, farmer, and wage earner that this revision take place. There is no mystery about the issuance and control of money and credits, yet it is amazing how few prominent persons know anything about this subject. The science of money is not properly taught in our school systems. Very few high school or college graduates know anything about it, yet the control of money and credits by the few who are informed on the subject and who have obtained special favors at the hands of our Government set the price of all labor, commodities, and services. By contracting currency and credits taxes and debts can be doubled; all other fixed charges are doubled.

A PLEA FOR CAMPAIGN FUNDS—ALL PUBLIC OFFICERS PROHIBITED BY LAW FROM SOLICITING CAMPAIGN CONTRIBUTIONS

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, in the Army and Navy Journal of July 9, 1932, the following paragraph appears soliciting funds from naval officers to aid the campaign for a seat in Congress being conducted by Capt. Robert Henderson, United States Navy, retired:

I have received a letter from a naval associate of Capt. Robert Henderson urging me to give more publicity to the suggestion that financial help be given to that officer in connection with his campaign for the Republican nomination for Congress. The writer urges that the Navy, suffering as it is from insufficient expenditures and reduced pay, should have a champion familiar with the service, such as the Army has in the case of that able Congressman, General MARTIN. I heartily indorse this view. Let the fleet in the Pacific start the ball rolling. It should organize a campaign committee to collect funds and send them to the Henderson-for-Congress Republican Club, 240 East Third Street, Long Beach, Calif. Don't lose any time about this. The campaign is on, and contributions will be welcome.

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I am advised by a colleague that all the candidates in his State are being circularized by an officer of the Officers' Reserve Corps, seeking to ascertain their position with respect to continuing to provide in the measure advocated by the War Department for the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army and each of the civil components thereof. My information is that the practice is being pursued in other States.

I think it is well at this time to call attention to the law as to such practices. Section 208 of Title XVIII, United States Code, provides:

It is unlawful for * * * any person receiving any salary or compensation for services from money derived from the Treasury of the United States to directly or indirectly solicit, receive, or be in any manner concerned in soliciting or receiving any assessment, subscription, or contribution for any political purpose whatever, from any other such officer, employee, or person.

Then section 212 of the same title provides:

Whoever shall violate any provision of the four preceding sections shall be fined not more than $5,000, or imprisoned not more than three years, or both.

Reserve officers engaged in practices such as I have referred to are not paying the expense incident thereto out of their own pockets. I do not think there can be any doubt but what they are amenable to the provisions of the statutes I have cited; and if the practice be continued, I am sure there will be no difficulty in having an investigation made at a more appropriate time for the purpose of ascertaining the names of those who have so proceeded without the pale of the law.

The instances I have cited are nothing more nor less than efforts to militarize the legislative branch of the Government; another case of organized minorities trying to dominate. Such tactics should be resented by every man on this floor who essays to be a Representative of his entire constituency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, an agreement has been made limiting debate to five minutes so I am inclined to think that early action will be had on the pending bill. Therefore I shall delay presenting my conference report on the so-called economy bill for a while in order to give the Senate an opportunity to conclude its consideration of the pending measure.

UNITED STATES ROANOKE COLONY COMMISSION

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, out of order, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Calendar 850, House Concurrent Resolution 26.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. A concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 26) to establish a commission to be known as the United States Roanoke colony commission, to report a plan and program for the celebration in 1934 of the three hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the birth of English-speaking civilization in America on Roanoke Island, N. C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the concurrent resolution?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I think we should have a morning hour in which the calendar may be called and all bills have an opportunity to be considered. Therefore I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, let me say to the senior Senator from Wisconsin that I shall be out of Washington for several days, and I expect that Congress may adjourn before I return. This is a small matter, but of very great importance to North Carolina. I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection and let the concurrent resolution be considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw his objection?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am sorry, but I must insist upon my objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, may I advise the Senator from North Carolina that I hope this afternoon to have the Senate adjourn until to-morrow so that we may have a morning hour and a call of the calendar to-morrow?

Mr. BAILEY. May I leave this matter, then, with the chairman of the committee who reported it, as I shall be out of town after 4 o'clock to-day?

Mr. McNARY. I shall be very glad to do what I can for the Senator.

TARIFF COMMISSION REPORTS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the acting chairman of the United States Tariff Commission, transmitting copies of reports sent to the President of investigations for purposes of section 336 of the tariff act of 1930 of infants' wool-knit outerwear, umbrellas and umbrella frames and skeletons, and furniture of wood, made by the commission pursuant to Senate Resolutions 295, 309, 312, and 325 of the Seventy-first Congress, which, with the accompanying reports, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

Mr. COPELAND presented resolutions adopted by the board of directors of the League of Nations Association, favoring action by the Congress before its adjournment "to request the President to confer with the governments represented at Lausanne in order that a permanent solution may be found for the problems which block the road to recovery from the present economic distress," which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Bellport, Long Island (N. Y.) Chamber of Commerce, favoring retrenchment in governmental expenditures, and protesting against the passage of legislation at this time increasing the financial obligations of the Government and also legislation that might impair the stability of the currency, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York State conference of mayors and other municipal officials, representing cities and first-class villages of the State, favoring the passage of legislation amending the Federal reserve bank act so as to permit, under proper restrictions, the Federal reserve banks to rediscount municipal loans made to relieve unemployment, and also the passage of legislation authorizing the Government through the proper agency to make loans direct to municipalities for work and home-relief purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table.

REPARATIONS AND WORLD WAR GUILT

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the RECORD resolutions adopted by the general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church relating to reparations and to war guilt. There are suggestions in the resolution about military training of which I personally do not approve, but I think what is set forth on the other subjects is of great interest.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WORLD PEACE

"The patriotism of the Methodist Episcopal Church has never been challenged. Neither our motive nor our loyalty must be impugned when we insist on the fulfillment of pledges made to the dead and assert our Christian ideals to the living."

In these terms, as in the general conference of 1924, we set ourselves to create the will to peace, the conditions for peace, and organization for peace. We rejoice in the position taken by the general conference of 1928 which declared that we are opposed to all military training in colleges and universities, and which further said, "The agencies of our church shall not be used in preparation for war; they shall be used in preparation for peace."

And now, in the name of Christ and in the interest of the prosperity and peace of the world, we feel constrained to make the following pronouncements:

We believe that the time has come for the world to acknowledge the fact that the sole guilt of the German nation for the World War can not in justice be maintained.

We hope that religious and other bodies the world around will join with us in urging the League of Nations to seek a revision of this article.

We also believe that the time has come for the world to recognize the fact that further reparations based upon this article should not be demanded of the German people. We take the position that reparations and war debts are not in the same category, either in law or in morals, and insist that this difference in principle be clearly recognized. We believe, however, that they are very closely related and that reduction or cancellation of reparations can not be made without seriously affecting war-debt payments to the United States. We further believe that what the United States might not be willing to do if the demand should be made on the basis of legal right it might be willing to consider in the interest of the prosperity and peace of the world. We therefore urge the Government of the United States, inviting the cooperation of other governments which are involved, to arrange for a new settlement of war debts based upon the present economic situation, upon drastic reduction of armaments and of military expenditures.

The Governments of 59 nations having, by the pact of Paris, officially renounced war, should now abolish weapons designed primarily for aggressive purposes. The drastic reduction or total abolition of such weapons, namely, tanks and heavy mobile guns, airplanes, airplane carriers, and gas, would greatly enhance the significance of the peace pact, allay deep suspicions and fears among nations less prepared to make war, prevent rivalry in armaments among all nations, and to insure the success of the disarmament conference now meeting in Geeva.

We call upon the world to witness the fact that the signatories to the Versailles treaty in forcing the disarming of Germany solemnly declared they were doing it "in order to render possible initiation of a general limitation of armaments of all nations"; also the fact that the United States, signatory to the treaty of Berlin, in which is embodied the preamble of Part V of the treaty of Versailles, made the same promise to Germany and the world, and, in our judgment, these nations are all morally and legally bound to a general reduction of armaments.

We commend the President of the United States and the Secretary of State for taking the position that our Government will not recognize any situation, treaty, or agreement which may be brought about by violation of treaty agreements. We rejoice in the indorsement of this position given by the Council of the League of Nations. We believe that this position, which is in harmony with the Paris pact and American traditions, and which, as Mr. Hoover has truly said, is "the strongest moral sanction ever proclaimed in the world," ushers in a new day in international diplomacy and brings new hope to mankind.

Believing that the Root formula fully protects American interest, we now urge the Government of the United States to ratify the World Court protocols, and also to enter the League of Nations with such Senate reservations as shall harmonize the constitution of the league with the Paris peace pact.

We recommend the establishment of a bureau in the Department of State whose duty it will be to promote education for peace.

We appeal for such modification of the present immigration act as will place orientals on the same quota basis as now governs immigration from European countries.

We desire to make our own the following position taken by the executive committee of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America:

"In view of certain judicial decisions which raise fundamental questions as to the justice of our present naturalization laws, we desire to put on record the following convictions:

"We hold that our country is benefited by having as citizens those who unswervingly follow the dictates of their consciences, and that a policy of denial of naturalization to aliens of such character is contrary to the ideals of a Nation into whose very structure the principle of political and religious liberty has been built.

"If the present naturalization law does, under fair interpretation, require the exclusion from citizenship of applicants who put allegiance to God above every other consideration, we believe that the law should be amended.

"Furthermore, we believe it to be the duty of the churches to give moral support to those individuals who hold conscientious scruples against participation in military training or military service."

We petition the Government of the United States to grant to members of the Methodist Episcopal Church who may be conscientious objectors to war the same exemption from military service as has long been granted to members of the Society of Friends and other similar religious organizations. Similarly we petition all educational institutions which require military training to excuse from such training any student belonging to the Methodist Episcopal Church who has conscientious scruples against it.

We earnestly petition the Government of the United States to cease all military training in civilian educational institutions. We urge Methodists in all parts of the world to make a like request of their respective governments, and further to plead for the abolition of compulsory military service in countries where it is now required.

RELIEF LEGISLATION

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I present a telegram from Mark T. McKee, executive director American Legion National Employment Commission, Chicago, Ill., relative to pending relief legislation, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., June 20, 1932.

Hon. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senator:

Appreciating the public-spirited and helpful attitude you have demonstrated from the very beginning in the interest of expediting unemployment relief legislation through self-liquidating projects without regard to your own political advantage, suggest that you ask Senator WAGNER to please show you my wire to him of yesterday in respect to his bill now on the floor of the Senate. My hope is you will feel constrained in the interest of expedition to use your position to facilitate passage Wagner bill at earliest date on the basis that it has best chance under all the circumstances of passage outlined in my wire to him, especially if my information is correct, that there is certain amount of opposition to relief for private industry as stressed by administration feature of your bill. Feel Wagner bill best means forestalling any danger of passage some unsound measure.

MARK T. MCKEE,
Executive Director American Legion
National Employment Commission.

INSTALLATION OF CAFETERIAS IN PUBLIC BUILDINGS

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Appropriations resolutions of the Atlantic City Chamber of Commerce relative to the installation of cafeterias in public buildings.

There being no objection, the resolutions were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas our attention has been directed to the fact that the second deficiency bill now before Congress contains a provision to appropriate funds for the installation of a cafeteria in the new Newark, N. J., post office; and

Whereas this chamber of commerce has in the past gone on record as being opposed to the principle of the Government engaging in business in competition with private enterprise; and

Whereas the establishment of a cafeteria in the Newark post office might set a precedent to be followed in other governmental buildings not only in this but in other States; and

Whereas the restaurant industry is a most important one in the State of New Jersey and would be adversely affected by such activity on the part of the Government: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Atlantic City Chamber of Commerce opposes specifically the proposal by the Government to operate a cafeteria in the new Newark, N. J., post office; and be it further

Resolved, That the Atlantic City Chamber of Commerce does again express its opposition to the Government engaging in business in competition with private enterprise; and be it further

Resolved, That the efforts of our Congressman and Senators be directed to the ends expressed in this resolution; and be it further Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Senators W. WARREN BARBOUR and HAMILTON KEAN, Congressman ISAAC BACHARACH, the American Hotel Association, and the Atlantic City Restaurant Association.

HUGH RIDDLE, President.

AGRICULTURAL RELIEF

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to publish in the RECORD a letter from G. G. Sawyer, of Annandale, Minn., and have it lie on the table.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table, as follows:

ANNANDALE, MINN., June 21, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS SCHALL,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I feel it my duty at this time to let you know how destitute the farmers are in this section of Minnesota. In Wright County, the banner county of the State, the farmers are losing their farms by the hundreds, and there seems to be no place on earth that we can turn to help them finance their homes.

The desperate farmers are taking more than half of my time making appeals to us to help them to save their homes. The life companies will not carry them when they can not pay their interest on their farm loans and the taxes are piling up.

Do not adjourn Congress until you have passed a relief bill that is a relief to the farmers. So far they have not been able to get one cent of the big relief measure that Congress did pass. The railroads and insurance companies had no trouble to get their money, but the restrictions for the farmer were so strict they did not get anything but a few sacks of cracked wheat for their chickens.

There will be a revolution in this State within 30 days if something is not done to relieve the distressed farmer.

Respectfully,

G. G. SAWYER.

THE CURRENCY SYSTEM

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD resolutions passed by the Central Council of District Clubs, St. Paul, Minn., and ask that they may lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Article I, section 8, of the Constitution of the United States provides that "Congress shall have the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof"; and

Whereas silver has been demonetized and the use of gold for monetary purposes restricted by such measures as the Glass-Steagall bill, and regulations of the Federal reserve banks, and in the place of free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver a system of theoretic flexible credit has been given to and controlled by powers outside of Congress. The reserve banks have no power to make the flexible-credit system function. The reserve banks can not force the member banks to use the flexible-credit system, and the result is that during depression the actual money is hoarded on account of its rapidly increasing value, and the flexible-credit system is not functioning at all. This condition is wrecking all our business institutions and homes, and enterprises of every kind are wrecked or stopped, throwing everybody out of work, and will in a short time stop all our business.

	Billions
The national income of United States for 1929 was	89.5
The national income of United States for 1930 was	65.5
Loss	24.0
The national income of United States for 1931 was	52.0
Loss	37.5
Estimated national income of United States for 1932	40.0
	49.5
Estimated loss for three years	111.0

This loss would have paid the proposed soldier bonus of $2,000,000,000 fifty-five times.

The above conditions have also brought about an inflation of debts, and the dollar is soaring to unreasonable inflation, while everything else is being deflated to from a fraction of a cent on the dollar to a few cents.

A bushel of potatoes during the war cost $5. This year the farmers here got 15 cents per bushel. The interest on $5 is 21¼ cents on the 4¼ per cent Liberty loan bonds. The farmer is then short 6¼ cents of paying the interest on 1 bushel of potatoes. The principal is therefore increasing at the rate of 6¼ cents per year, and he is further and further in debt.

It would take a farmer 33 years to pay for a $5 bushel of potatoes with 15-cent potatoes, and in the meantime the interest has eaten up all his payments and he is further in debt than when he started. In 33 years there would be added by simple interest another $1.65 cents, or equal to 11 bushels of potatoes, making a total of 44 bushels of potatoes, or 44 years, with no hope in view. This is equal to multiplying the national debt by 44, which will cover more than the entire wealth of the United States. Now therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Central Council of District Clubs, of St. Paul, Minn., that our Representatives in Congress shall speedily exercise the authority given them by the Constitution and regulate the value of the dollar, and provide money so that our business activities shall not be blocked, as at the present time, by the nonexistence of a medium of exchange: Be it further

Resolved, That it is not necessary to float large bond issues to get the necessary money into circulation, which it has been shown is futile, as it simply increases the value of the dollar; but the money shall be issued direct to the people by the Government for services rendered, such as the soldiers' bonus. This would get a small amount of money into circulation and give a small but necessary reduction in the present inflated value of the dollar; Be it further

Resolved, That the constitutional provision of the free and unlimited coinage of gold and silver be immediately resumed, and thereby furnish a real and tangible basis of money for the medium of exchange, instead of the present evanescent flexible-credit system that is evidently being manipulated for the concentration of wealth in a few hands, inflation of debts, disruption of business, and robbing 99 per cent of the people of the United States of all their wealth.

GRASSHOPPER PLAGUE IN THE NORTHWEST

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD and to lie on the table some telegrams and letters I have received with reference to the grasshopper situation in the Northwest.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 16, 1932.

Senator THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington:

Supplementing telegram 14th sent Secretary Hyde, Speaker GARNER, and Congressman ANDRESEN, we have further investigated grasshopper situation. Can report that Minnesota can and will take care of situation in Minnesota without Federal aid. We are equally certain that funds are needed immediately for North and South Dakota and Montana. Even a week's delay would probably necessitate much larger amount. If $500,000 could be immediately available for these three States, we believe situation can be satisfactorily handled. Legal situation in these States makes immediate appropriations impossible, and financial condition of counties involved is such that funds could not be raised for immediate use, anyway. Arrangements will be made to advance money if we can have Government's assurance that we will be reimbursed. Please address E. W. Decker, Northwestern National Bank, Minneapolis.

A. R. Rogers, chairman Minneapolis Industrial Committee; B. B. Sheffield, president Minneapolis Civic and Commerce Association; L. E. Wakefield, president First National Bank; E. L. Carpenter, president Shevlin, Carpenter & Clarke Co.; E. W. Decker, president Northwestern National Bank; W. A. Durst, president Minnesota Loan & Trust Co.; F. T. Heffelfinger, president F. H. Peavey & Co.; Geo. D. Dayton, president the Dayton Co.; C. T. Jaffray, president Soo Line Railroad; Thos. J. Wallace, president Farmers & Mechanics Savings Bank; Carl W. Jones, publisher the Minneapolis Journal; F. E. Murphy, publisher the Minneapolis Tribune; John Thompson, publisher the Minneapolis Star; J. H. Macmillan, president Cargill Elevator Co.

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 22, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington:

St. Paul association just concluded extensive survey, which shows the grasshopper menace to be very serious in Minnesota and the Dakotas. We believe it imperative that immediate aid be given by the Government to eradicate grasshoppers. We ask your wholehearted cooperation to help the farmers of the Northwest.

CARL W. CUMMINS,
President St. Paul Association of Commerce.

DULUTH, MINN., June 17, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate:

Our reports indicate serious menace from grasshoppers, if not absolute crop destruction, in the Red River Valley both in North Dakota and Minnesota, and we would appreciate your utmost efforts to attain Federal relief, even if only a temporary loan for the North Dakota section. We are advised that Minneapolis interests have sufficient funds at present for Minnesota relief, but the situation is serious in both North Dakota and Minnesota, and immediate action is necessary to prevent destruction of crops in this area that suffered extreme damage last season also.

DULUTH CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

PITTSBURGH COAL CO. OF WISCONSIN,
Minneapolis, Minn., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senator, Washington, D. C.

HONORABLE SIR: Being familiar with the serious credit condition in Minnesota, North and South Dakota, Wisconsin, and part of Iowa, because of the farmers' situation, I sincerely urge that you take some immediate steps to prevent this anticipated and quite evident grasshopper plague.

Daily reports from the territory indicate splendid crop condition, but there is always the underlying fear of the grasshopper, now about to sprout wings. If any help is to be rendered, it must be given immediately.

For the protection of our country and to quicken the return of prosperity I urge immediate action.

Very truly yours,

O. F. CARLSON, Treasurer.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., June 15, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: We in Minnesota are fearful of what is going to happen in the western part of our State, North and South Dakota, and Montana between now and the 15th of July with the "grasshopper pest." Unless action is begun at once we will lose the harvesting on one of the best crops we have had in a number of years, and if such a catastrophe happens I do not know what the farmers of this country and the people living in the Twin Cities will do.

We all beg of you to get action on this appropriation for extermination at once.

Very truly yours,

SPRADLIN MOTHPROOF CORPORATION,
By W. H. SCHAFER.

BILLS INTRODUCED

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4928) to provide fees to be charged by the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4929) to provide for the consideration of alternate materials in the construction of public buildings; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

FEDERAL WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW FOR EMPLOYEES IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill, and I ask that an explanatory statement thereof may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The bill (S. 4927) to provide compensation for disability or death resulting from injury to employees in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The explanatory statement submitted by Mr. WAGNER is as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON PROPOSED FEDERAL WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION LAW FOR INTERSTATE COMMERCE EMPLOYEES

This legislation is introduced for the purpose of extending the principle of workmen's compensation for industrial accidents to the most important group of workers remaining without this modern protection—interstate commerce employees.

In 1912 a congressional committee, after two years' exhaustive investigation, reported voluminously in favor of a Federal workmen's compensation law for employees injured in interstate commerce. The bill was passed by both Houses of Congress, but because of differing provisions which were never adjusted, failed to become law.

Meanwhile, State after State has discarded the outgrown system of employers' liability suits for damages, and Congress has adopted three workmen's compensation laws: In 1916 for civilian employees of the Government, in 1927 for longshoremen and harbor workers, and in 1928 for private employees in the District of Columbia. Workmen's compensation, which is now adopted in this country in all but four States (Arkansas, Florida, Mississippi, and South Carolina) has been demonstrated to be for the best interests of workers, employers, and the whole community. But interstate commerce employees are still subject to the antiquated system of employers' liability, under the Federal act of 1908.

The late Chief Justice Taft, in an address before the American Law Institute on May 9, 1929, said:

"A good many years ago it was attempted in Congress to provide a workmen's compensation act, or what was equivalent to it, with reference to that great body of men whose lives are constantly at stake in the operation of the transportation systems of this country. We in the Supreme Court, and all judges who have to do with the active conduct of litigation, realize the amount of time that is taken up in litigation of that kind, and also realize how much has been saved to the courts of the country by workmen's compensation acts. But we have no such system in the Federal courts. We need it.

"I hope that in the study of negligence, which I understand is going on, you may stop for a moment and look over to the kindred subject of how insurance against injury, disaster, and death of railroad employees can be carried on under the Constitution by Congress. If you will look back, as we can, to the years since those Federal bills were initiated and think how much time might have been saved and how much real good could have been done by introducing what is practically a system of general insurance to save lives and limbs—and women and widows by means of sustenance after the death of the bread winner—I think you will feel stirred to a movement of that sort. It failed, I am sorry to say, because of the spirit that actuated some of the opponents, which has been restated with emphasis in the revelations that recently have been made in New York in what is called the ambulance-chasing investigation. Now, far be it from me to say that the Federal bar has any ambulance chasers, but I think I would investigate, and if there are none, find it out." [Laughter.]

From the general welfare angle, this problem has been discussed from time to time during all these years; and at the joint meeting of representatives of railway operators and railway unions at Chicago in January of this year, steps were taken looking toward the earnest consideration of action by Congress on a Federal workmen's compensation law for interstate commerce employees.

In introducing this bill it is, of course, understood that no action is possible at this session of the Congress; but it is important that a concrete plan be available for distribution and study during the coming months in order that the desirable action may finally be taken with reasonable promptness.

This bill appropriately follows somewhat closely the existing well-tested Federal longshoremen's act of 1927 which was designed to meet a similar administrative problem where private employees under Federal jurisdiction are scattered throughout the country. The bill applies to all workers employed in interstate commerce by railroads, express and sleeping car companies, or by any person operating a vehicle or airplane on a regular route. It provides for all necessary medical care and, after a 7-day noncompensated waiting period, for cash compensation based on two-thirds of wages.

The proposed act is administered by a representative commission of three members appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate. Deputy commissioners in important centers, under the unifying supervision of the commission, do the actual day by day work of hearing claims and awarding compensation. Appeal on questions of law from the decision of the deputy is taken to the Federal district court as under the longshoremen's compensation act adopted by Congress five years ago.

Special provision is made for accident prevention work and for the rehabilitation of disabled workers. Employers are, of course, required to insure the payment of compensation, and administrative expenses are assessed upon insurance carriers including self-insurers as is done in New York and a number of other States including Delaware, Georgia, Kentucky, Maryland, Missouri, New Jersey, North Carolina, Texas, and Virginia. The inadequacies and evils of the existing system of employers' liability for interstate commerce workers indicate the necessity for modern legislation to meet present-day needs which will effectively and adequately protect all employees injured in interstate commerce. Such legislation can be worked out to the advantage of employers and employees and will at the same time relieve the public of the various expenses growing out of litigation.

LOUISE BECKE

Mr. DAVIS submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 249), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1931, to Louise Becke, widow of Edward Becke, late a private of the police force for the Senate Office Building under the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

Also, I ask leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate a letter from the State Department transmitting flood-control reports on the Lower Rio Grande, which letter was submitted by me to the Senate on May 25, 1932, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR BAILEY AT NORTH CAROLINA DEMOCRATIC STATE CONVENTION

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered at the recent Democratic State convention of North Carolina by the junior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The address is as follows:

POLITICAL RESPONSIBILITY FOR THE DEPRESSION

In the midst of the third year of unprecedented national and personal disaster we have met in the beginning of a campaign that will determine the control of our country. That control will determine whether the policy of our Government shall continue to be what it has been and now is, or a new policy shall be instituted.

The Government now goes back to the people—to the 8,000,000 of workers who have so long been out of work, of 7,000,000 of farmers unrewarded for their toil, of men of business ruined, of homes whose hearts are broken—to an entire population in a fear of want and poverty such as the people of this country have not hitherto known or even suspected could be possible. And it is for them in the orderly but determined and solemn exercise of their sovereignty and responsibility to make their own decision, for themselves and no other, and in the fear of God and no other.

In unprecedented conditions we shall proceed into an unparalleled campaign, and upon its issues hang the destiny of a great civilization.

There has been debate as to the responsibility for these conditions. The Republican Party was in complete power from 1921 until March 4, 1931, and to this day they are in control of the Senate and the entire executive branch of the Federal Government. But Republican partisans disclaim responsibility of their party and contend that the character and the conduct of the Government is in no way related to the sinister series of events which we describe as the panic of the depression, and which all recognize as a national disaster which has spared no one in our land.

We know that a great Republican, the late Senator Morrow, declared that a political party that takes credit for the rain must accept responsibility for the drought. We know that the present Republican President promised prosperity—promised it in terms more glowing and more definite than any candidate ever did before—promised it generally and specifically and in his own name and the name of the Republican Party. We know that thereby he and his party assumed responsibility for prosperity and so invited the condemnation of all whose hopes have been disappointed. We know that Republican partisans have long been in the habit of describing their party as the "party of prosperity"—thus cultivating the faith that it could prevent depression and disaster. And we know that, notwithstanding the great panic of the nineties set in in the administration of Harrison in 1889–90, Republicans have uniformly proclaimed and taught that the Democratic Party was responsible for that depression.

Certainly, according to the doctrine and the practice of the Republican Party, no Republican can with a straight face deny the responsibility of his party for this situation; certainly no Republican can look another Republican in the face and deny his party's responsibility. Certainly no Republican can deny in the presence of any Democrat the responsibility of the Republican Party without profound apology.

But I would not rely in a matter so grave upon the argument of partisan estoppel, or partisan retaliation. It is our duty to find the cause of our woes in order that we may intelligently address ourselves to them. Intellectual honesty is essential in order that there may be no error in our struggle for security now.

Are we supported by economic authority in our accusations against the Republican Party in the premises? Let me answer by quotations from two eminent witnesses.

Mr. J. M. Kenworthy is not a Democrat; he is not a Republican. He is a distinguished member of the House of Commons of Great Britain. In the Current History Magazine for May, 1932, in an article entitled "The Way Out," he says:

"Rightly or wrongly, the governors of the Federal reserve banks and their advisers, the invisible rulers of America, desired to check this boom in 1927; they did not do so because there was a presidential election coming in 1928, and tremendous pressure was brought to bear on the Federal reserve banks to do nothing, in the interests of the Republican Party, to check the prosperity wave. Therefore, although warnings were issued, the market was given its head, allowed to rush along the road of inflation, not of the currency, but of values, and the curb was not applied until 1929.

"Not so long ago I asked a prominent spokesman of American high finance, who had a good deal to do with the final decision to check speculation and stock-exchange gambling, whether the American boom could not have been continued indefinitely by the simple expedient of a presidential election annually. He replied that this would work well enough for a few years, but the subsequent slump would have been all the more violent."

Do you observe that this impartial witness declares that the speculative boom and the stock-exchange gambling was not checked in 1927 because a presidential campaign was approaching in 1928, and that the Federal reserve banks under Government supervision were induced to do nothing to curb this boom, this speculation, the abuses that it caused, and the crash that was predicated?

Now, let me call another impartial witness, Sir Arthur Salter, head of the Bureau of Economics of the League of Nations, not a Republican, not a Democrat, but an economist of universal recognition. In his book entitled "Recovery: The Second Effort," published in April, 1932, on pages 30 and 31, he says:

"Meantime, however, while this boom was at its height in America it began to precipitate reaction in Europe and to repeal some of the hidden weaknesses that had been masked by the earlier phases of the upward movement. For the fury of the speculative mania drove people to borrow money to buy on margins at fantastic rates; call money rose over 12 per cent. The Federal reserve authorities tried to put a sharp check on the speculation by restricting credit and raising the discount rate. Their action, while it handicapped industrial borrowing and reduced purchasing power, failed to arrest the speculative boom. On the contrary, it created further trouble. It increased the attraction of high interest rates to the European who was looking for the most profitable short-term employment for his funds.

"Short-term funds flowed rapidly westward and soon the drain endangered the currency reserves of all the principal banks of Europe. Each of them tried to safeguard its position by raising its rates; and the process of competitive increases in discount rates throughout Europe raised the costs of overdrafts and loans, discouraged enterprise in marginal cases, and started the depression; and then came the crash in America. The fall in values was proportionate to the precipitous rise. The depression spread rapidly and throughout the world. The fall in rates of interest was no check to it. For while dear money can check a precarious expansion, cheap money as a stimulus is as nothing against the effects of falling prices and falling demand."

You observe that Mr. Salter declares that the speculative boom in America "started the depression." And that Mr. Kenworthy says that the speculative boom not only was not curbed but was encouraged by the Federal reserve authorities in the interest of the Republican Party in the 1928 election. We know also that President Coolidge, Secretary Mellon, and President Hoover encouraged this boom. We know that they could have arrested it by restricting the employment of Federal reserve bank credit in that orgy of speculation, and that they not only did not do so but actually issued public statements calculated to increase the speculative fever of the time.

Perhaps we do not realize the effect of that speculative boom. We know that it caught millions in its whirlpools. But do we know that it absorbed in New York alone in one year (1928) $12,000,000,000 in cash and $50,000,000,000 of credit; and that in 1929 it absorbed $22,000,000,000 in cash and over $100,000,000,000 in credit? These astronomical figures are not estimates. They are taken from the reports of the New York Stock Exchange. Consider them in light of the simple fact that the total circulation of money in our country is only $5,000,000,000.

What was the effect of this diversion of cash and credit? It drew funds in great quantity from Europe and paralyzed business on that continent. It drew funds from all over our land, from the treasuries of corporations as well as from banks, drew cash from young and old, men and women, and in such volume as to bleed industry, business, and agriculture white. Think of it, $122,000,000,000 of cash and credit in one year, five times all we spent in the World War, twenty-five times the total volume of our currency. The high interest rates paid on Wall Street for money could not be paid elsewhere, and the cash and credit of two continents poured in a mighty flood from the channels of agriculture, business, and industry into stock gambling.

This alone is sufficient to account for the depression; and, more than any other one cause, it does account for it, just as Messrs. Salter and Kenworthy have pointed out. And, if these impartial witnesses are to be believed, the Republicans in charge of our Government, so far from taking action to prevent this diversion of the money of our country from legitimate employment, actually encouraged it, and with a plain, selfish, political, and partisan motive.

So much for the responsibility of the Republican Party in the premises. It remains to be seen with what manner of treatment the depression was met when it came. Strong measures at the outset would doubtless have saved much that has since been lost beyond recovery.

If the Republican Party had direct responsibility for this depression with respect to its cause, even more is it responsible for the manner with which it has met, or failed to meet, the demands of this great disaster. The governing powers not only failed to safeguard our credit and currency in 1927, 1928, 1929, but they have failed properly to use them in 1930, 1931, and 1932.

I shall undertake here to maintain that the President, against whom I would not unjustly bring an accusation, has at no time understood or appreciated the character or the depth of the situation with which he was called upon to deal, and against which on the campaign he had so confidently given the people guarantees.

Fortunately, we do not have to speculate as to the mind of the President in this matter. We may array his utterances by the calendar in the light of events, as follows, in his own words:

July 27, 1928: "The outlook of the world to-day is for the greatest era of commercial expansion in history." This on the eve of the disaster, when agricultural commodities had already fallen.

October 25, 1929—in the very hour of the crash that signaled to the world the onset of this disaster:

"The fundamental business of the country—that is, production and distribution of commodities—is on a sound and prosperous basis."

Sound asleep.

December 3, 1929: "I am convinced we have reestablished confidence."

Sound asleep.

January 1, 1930: "The tide of employment has changed in the right direction."

Sound asleep.

May, 1930: "We have turned the corner."

Sound asleep.

June, 1931: "The battle is upon 1,000 fronts—there is no sudden stroke of either governmental or private action which can dissolve these world difficulties."

"We have passed through the worst of the storm."

Awakened, but half dreaming—20 months after the depression had struck in.

The quotations will be sufficient to convince that the President had no understanding of what had happened in 1928 and 1929, or what was going on in 1930 and 1931. Little did he do. Little did he propose to do. Little did he ask the Republican Congress to do. And his defenders must admit that thus he permitted this indescribable disaster to run an unbridled course until its force was so great and its ruin so vast that no power could arrest it. Recovery passed out of the bounds of possibility. He was asleep at the switch in the crucial hour of his people's destiny. Neither remedy nor relief was applied in the time when remedy and relief meant most. And now we desperately seek from week to week the means of temporary relief to avert ultimate disaster.

Bad as is this case for the President and his party, it is worse in the light of the events of 1931. A new Congress had been elected in November, 1930, and it was qualified as of March 4, 1931. The House was Democratic by a narrow majority—it was fresh from the people. Did he call it into session? It could not assemble or act prior to December 4, 1931, without his call. He refused to call it, and so took sole responsibility for the conduct of affairs from March 4, 1931, to December 4, 1931.

It was in this period that the depression deepened and spread until it embraced every home. In this period the storm became 10,000 tornadoes. In the summer of 1931 the people were in a state of panic, and in September, October, and November the banks of America fell like trees in a hurricane. Credit first contracted and then disappeared. Commodities fell far below the cost of production. The army of the unemployed grew to colossal proportions. Mortgage foreclosures and tax foreclosures took hundreds of thousands of homesteads. This proud and happy country became a land of fear and of distress indescribable. The very foundations seemed to be sinking. American confidence and courage took flight before unseen forces too strange for our land and time.

When at last December 4, 1931, came, the Congress was confronted with emergency conditions which made it impossible to consider constructive measures. It was enough from time to time to enact emergency measures to prevent the ultimate degree of disaster.

Such was the course of the President and his party throughout the first 25 months of this series of disasters which we call the depression. No one can deny his and his party's responsibility for the conduct of the Government during these months.

The measures of the present Congress, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, the Glass-Steagall Act, the revenue act, the efforts to reduce expenses, the relief acts—if anything may be claimed for them as of the winter and spring of 1932, how much more might have been claimed for them in 1931?

Has the President urged us to balance the Budget? Why did he not urge the 1931 Congress to balance the 1931 Budget which showed a deficit of a billion dollars? Why did he not in 1931 take steps to prevent the $2,800,000,000 deficit as of June 30, 1932?

Did the reconstruction finance act arrest in 1932 the closing of the banks? How many more would it have saved in 1931?

Did the Glass-Steagall Act expand resources for credit in 1932? How much more would it have done in 1931—before confidence had been extinguished?

Did the purchase of $800,000,000 of Government securities in the open market make that sum available for credit expansion in 1932? How much more would it have served in 1931?

These measures came too late. There was a time when they might have prevented ruin and restored confidence. But in 1932 all they could do was to prevent the ultimate crisis and downfall of the business structure.

Such was the price the people of the United States paid for a President and a party that knew nothing of what was involved in the first two years of this disastrous experience; a President and a party that promised prosperity in 1928 and proved in 1930 and 1931 utterly helpless against adversity.

This, Mr. Chairman, is not the whole story. We may read in the record of the Republican Party and its candidate just what they propose with respect to this situation—this grave situation that means poverty and want to more than half the homes in America. I feel safe in saying upon the record that they propose that we shall come through this long, long night of want and fear by endurance and survival.

They do not propose remedy. They do not propose relief. They propose endurance. At this moment we are confronted with a long prospect of suffering. They tell us that we must liquidate $150,000,000,000 of indebtedness under a tax charge in the land of $14,000,000,000 a year, on the present basis of commodities. It can not be done. The Pharoahs did not exact so much of the children of Israel, whom the righteous God heard and avenged. They were required to make brick without straw. Shall we be required to pay $150,000,000,000 of debts, contracted on high commodity prices under low commodity prices? Can we pay $14,000,000,000 in taxes, $7,500,000 annual interest, and $7,500,000 on principal each year with a national income of less than $60,000,000,000?

To expect this is to expect us to pay, not in money, but in bankruptcy dividends, in ruin, in poverty, and in life itself—to lose all, to leave our homes, to abandon our hopes of educating our children, and to go helpless into old age. The young might endure and recover, but those of mature years could not.

Such is the course predicated by the present posture of the Republican Party. It is intolerable, and it will not be tolerated.

Ours, Mr. Chairman, is a strange history. Our pioneer ancestors subdued the wilderness; they built homes; they became comfortable. In 1837 an economic collapse, a panic, a depression, a contraction of credit, a loss of commodity prices much like this present, took their all. They and their sons built anew—with true American courage. But in 1857 another collapse, another contraction, another series of economic faults took from them much of that which they had accumulated. Again they returned to their tasks, they and their children, and soon they were apparently secure. But in 1873 another depression, a contraction of credit, a loss in commodity prices, a disaster like this present again took from millions all that they had saved. And again they returned to their tasks; again they saved and built. And again, in 1890–1896, there fell a disaster like this present, and again they were reduced to poverty. And again our fathers and ourselves returned with stout hearts to our tasks. Again we labored and saved and built. Again we felt secure. And now we repeat the doleful story of every generation that has preceded us for more than a hundred years. Again our farms are foreclosed, the trustees in bankruptcy and the sheriffs take us, and millions eat the bread of sorrow.

In the name of America, in the name of the good God, these things ought not to be. Ours ought not to be the task of Sisyphus. We are free men. We must find the fault wherever it is. We must make no mistake; we must follow no false light; we must avoid the heedless agitators on the one hand and the schemers on the other; we must keep a straight course; we must search out the sources of these wrongs and establish ourselves and our children in safety. We can successfully and justly regulate the credit and the currency of our country. We can devote it to the legitimate engagements of men. Let it not be said of us that we will be content to endure and survive. We will master our difficulties. We will right our wrongs. We are a great people, we have a mighty Republic, we have a noble Constitution, and we are capable consistently with our Constitution and consistently with the character of our Republic, as established now by 15 years of experience, of making our way out of this situation and of so providing that it shall never happen again.

This, Mr. Chairman, is the task by destiny appointed to the American people in the year 1932. I offer them in all confidence as the sure vehicle of their will and the instrument of their vindication the Democratic Party—a national party, an historic party, a party which derives its life from the people, a party which will serve them to the full measure of their will and need.

WONDERFUL THINGS IN FLORIDA

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask leave to have published in the RECORD an editorial from the Florida Times-Union, of Jacksonville, in the issue of June 21, 1932, entitled "Wonderful Things in Florida."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WONDERFUL THINGS IN FLORIDA

It seems certain that when the United States Government establishes the Everglades National Park, in the southernmost area of mainland of this wonderful State, there will steadily increase the number of tourists and travelers to view wonders that will be brought into greater notice by such designation. Of course the remarkable things in that location, proposed as the bounds of the new national park, have not changed nor become less wonderful, and it is the personal discovery that will be made which is expected to cause admiration and applause. It will be the immediate pleasure of thousands who visit the Everglades Park to tell of what they have seen in the beautiful, remarkable section, yet held as nature framed the pictures on every side; and with wild life, as existent for centuries, abounding on land and water.

A bulletin recently sent out from the Department of the Interior tells of the Mangrove Cliff reaching out into the Gulf of Mexico in the Everglades National Park area. The bulletin, in part, tells:

"One of the features of the proposed Everglades National Park in Florida will be 'a veritable cliff of living trees, resisting the attacks of storm waves sweeping across a thousand miles of waters.' It is perhaps the most outstanding portion of the spectacular mangrove forest which reaches its climax in this section of Florida. The columnar trunks and dark foliage of this particular group of mangroves rise abruptly out of the Gulf of Mexico, as mighty cliffs of rock, resisting the battering power of the ceaseless ocean waves.

"This living cliff, reaching a height of seldom more than 40 to 60 feet, gives a sense of vastness by its length, by the evident greatness of the forest behind it, and by the opposing great sweep of the Gulf rounding down over the western horizon toward Mexico.

"Sometimes, as in the case of the cliff of solid rock, the mangrove cliff gives way to the resistless power of the sea, but only slowly and stubbornly, and sending new root buttresses down to grip the underlying marls as storms break the earlier supports. Gazing upon it, one sees an age-long battle between two forces of nature.

"Back from the Gulf the mangrove forest is traversed by the interconnecting tidal channels, prevalently about three or four hundred feet wide, but many of them narrowed and some wider. Along and near these channels the mangroves reach their best development, many trees rising to the heights between 60 and 80 feet, and some to 100 feet."

With Congress so busy with other things, it is entirely possible that the matter of designating on the southern tip of the Florida mainland a new national park may be postponed or overlooked at this time. There is, however, an increasing interest noted in the subject, and in another session, perhaps, the Senate and House of Representatives can give some attention to the proposal. There is slight expense involved in the transfer of this wonderland from State to National control, and those who have any idea of its value as a national project are favorable to it. The Senate bill, which authorized the taking over into the national park system of the Everglades Park was passed long ago. Its introduction and passage in the House were not expected to meet with opposition, but for various reasons have not been accomplished as yet. The matter is likely to get the desired legislative attention in the next session of Congress.

COMMENTS ON THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a recent editorial appearing in the Toledo (Ohio) Blade.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Toledo (Ohio) Blade, of June 17, 1932]

A PARTY WITHOUT A PROGRAM

The Republican National Convention has ended. President Hoover has been renominated, and the majority of the delegates are apparently satisfied with the platform of their party.

It is pathetic to find how few of the professional politicians understand the human mind. During normal times the people are not interested in politics and most of them just go along and vote for their party ticket. But to-day, with the economic conditions so bad—with 10,000,000 or more people unemployed, and many millions more on part-time work, there is a different feeling existing in the mind of the American citizen; and although we have never given professional politicians credit for any business judgment, we believed that they were familiar with the fact that we are in the worst depression the country has ever known. And so it was expected definite plans would be formed to help us, to a degree at least, to bring more employment and with it hope for better days to come.

Instead, all that was done was for the majority of the delegates to flatter each other for what it was claimed the administration had accomplished during the last few years.

The speeches made by the administration leaders would be humorous if they were not pathetic. Not a single constructive suggestion was made. Every statement referred to the wonderful things that had been done; and meanwhile millions are out of work and wondering how they are to get food for their families.

Even on the question of prohibition, which the Republican Party now admits has been a failure, the plank adopted is a cowardly straddle—a jumble of words without meaning. All intelligent people will recognize the proposal as a fraud planned to please the drys and fool the wets.

Instead of demanding an immediate change in the Volstead law which would bring employment to hundreds of thousands of people, besides yielding excise taxes to the Government so the Budget can actually and definitely be balanced—and instead of urging that after that there should be repeal, the convention pussyfooted the entire question.

No prosperity loan bond issue to give work to at least some of the unemployed is pledged—no word is said about a manufacturers' sales tax which would permit the reduction of the excessive taxes which now burden industry—nothing helpful or intelligent is planned but rather the Nation is asked to hope and trust that through sheer luck business may improve.

Meanwhile, our people who are out of work, must remain out of work. Our stores must continue to lose money. Our factories, which are closed, must remain closed, and those working on part time must continue so.

We are not trying to place all the blame on the President's shoulders. He has tried, and in some instances succeeded in doing, some very constructive work. But during all this time business has become worse and worse, and it was expected that the administration which controlled the platform committee would plan and authorize improvements which were bound to be of almost immediate help to the unemployed, and indirectly to general business. But only platitudes and flattery of the past, of the distant past, were the net results of this convention.

One thing the delegates did do. They dug a grave in which they will bury the Republican Party, at least for the next four years. The party of Lincoln, of McKinley, of Theodore Roosevelt, and Coolidge. The party which helped to build our country—as it was—not as it is—but which can not live on past glory.

LOANS TO STATES—SYSTEM OF HIGHWAYS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 12445) to relieve destitution, to broaden the lending powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, and to create employment by authorizing and expediting a public-works program, and providing a method of financing such program.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the bill before us is subject to amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, being the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I invite the attention of the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], with reference to a motion which I propose to make. I intend to move to strike out, in line 4 of his amendment, the words "for educational or hospitalization purposes within such State." I ask the Senator from Mississippi if he will not consent to modify his amendment by striking out those words.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that I would prefer to have them stricken out. I put them in the amendment to restrict it at the instance of Senators who had the bill in charge, thinking it might draw more approval from the Senate. I have no objection to striking out those words.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. How, then, would the amendment read?

Mr. ASHURST. Paragraph (a) would read as follows:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make advances to any State on the security of the bonds of such State, and on such terms and conditions as the corporation deems advisable.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. So the Reconstruction Finance Corporation could, upon presentation of the bonds, loan money for any purpose?

Mr. ASHURST. Yes; and the State would be authorized, and it would be eligible, under the law, for the State to use the money for educational purposes or hospitalization purposes, or any other purpose that was legitimate under the constitution of the State.

Mr. HARRISON. But it would leave it within the discretion of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation if the State can sell its bonds otherwise on the market not to purchase the bonds.

Mr. ASHURST. Quite true. I do not seek to strike out paragraph (b).

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Arizona in what respect the amendment would differ from the $300,000,000 bill which the Senate has already passed?

Mr. ASHURST. It would not differ in any material respect, except this amendment provides for only $200,000,000, as I understand. It would not be materially different otherwise.

Mr. VANDENBERG. May I ask the Senator from Mississippi if it is the purpose to merge the other bill into the bill pending, and if so why should not the amount here be $300,000,000 instead of $200,000,000?

Mr. HARRISON. Of course, the Senator appreciates that the $300,000,000 measure passed by the Senate was for relief work in the States, the funds to be allocated to the States according to population upon application of the governor, without any security, except——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. I inquire who has the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arizona has the floor, and yielded to a question.

Mr. ASHURST. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. The only security the Government gets under that proposed legislation is the withdrawal of road funds which the States may be entitled to receive in the future. This proposal is merely to take care of States that are now unable to sell their bonds because of depressed market conditions. It leaves it optional under the modification suggested by the Senator from Arizona, and does not confine it merely to educational or hospitalization purposes.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am not quarreling with the purpose——

Mr. HARRISON. But under this amendment, as the Senator will realize, the credit of the State is put behind any loan which may be made.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am trying to determine whether the Senator intends merely to supplement the other measure or to substitute something else for it.

Mr. HARRISON. No; this is merely to supplement the other measure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator offer his amendment in its original form or does he modify it?

Mr. HARRISON. I accept the modification of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Arizona.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi modifies his amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I merely wish to say, so far as the amendment offered is concerned, that it does not relate to the subject matter which is treated in the legislation now pending. It has no limitation; it confers upon the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the power to purchase bonds of a State to the extent of a certain sum which the State may use for any purpose at all; it may be for a charitable or educational purpose, or it may be a purpose which we would not approve, such as the construction of a building. It opens wide the door which we have been trying to keep closed in the effort not to do anything which would impose unnecessarily additional tax burdens upon the people in the different communities. I want the Senate to understand that the amendment has that effect, but if it is the wish of the Senate that this amendment should be considered in conference, of course I shall abide by that decision.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator gave the impression that the amendment did not relate to the purposes of the bill under consideration. The Senator knows that some States can not now sell their bonds because of the depressed condition of the market, and that unless assistance shall be afforded, sanitariums and hospitals and schools will close, which will add to the unemployment situation. What I have said is true with reference to certain States, and it is only with regard to that situation that I am trying to assist.

Mr. WAGNER. I may say to the Senator that if the funds were limited to a certain definite use which would appeal to our sense of justice, and which we could recognize as constituting a real emergency, a different question would be presented; but this is an amendment giving to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the power to purchase from the States bonds for any purpose without any limitation.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I make a suggestion to the Senator in his time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WAGNER. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. If this amendment should be adopted in the broader language as suggested by several Senators, and which is different from the original suggestion, because I was trying to carry out the Senator's idea, of course, in conference if the conferees should want to restrict it they would have the power to restrict it to educational or hospitalization purposes.

Mr. WAGNER. I was not certain as to whether the conferees would have that power as to an amendment of this kind.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not think there can be any doubt of that. If the whole amount of $200,000,000 shall be provided for any purpose the conferees could certainly restrict it to some purpose.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator understands, of course, that in regard to all these matters I want to do everything possible to alleviate distress in the States where the community is unable to cope with its situation, and where I think the Federal Government might help to relieve conditions, but, as the proposal is now drawn, it does not confine its purpose to the matters mentioned by the Senator and as provided in the amendment originally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from New York has expired.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] inquired as to whether the purpose of this amendment was not already met by the $300,000,000 bill which we passed some days ago. The money provided under that bill was to be loaned to States upon certificate of the governor to the effect that it was needed for relief and relief work, and it was provided that it could be used only for such purpose upon the certificate of the governor that it was needed and that the money could not be raised by the ordinary methods by the States. There are restrictions in that measure.

The amendment as originally offered by the Senator from Mississippi provided for a loan of $200,000,000, without any certificate of any kind concerning the financial condition of the State or its necessities or its inability to secure funds; but the amendment originally did restrict the application of the money to educational or hospitalization purposes. Now, however, that is stricken out; and as it stands now it provides for loans to States to the amount of $200,000,000 without any certification from the governor of the necessity of it at all, the funds to be utilized by the State for any purpose for which the State may care to utilize the money.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I understand that a State desirous of obtaining money to feed the hungry, under the bill to which the Senator refers and which has been passed, would be required to furnish certain affidavits and information to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, while under the pending amendment if a State desires to build a school or hospital no requirement of that kind is made.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Exactly. The point is this: The purpose of the act is for relief or for relief work, to provide employment.

Not only is there a departure, Mr. President, from the general purpose of the bill by this amendment, but there is no safeguard at all; and the money may be furnished simply upon the application of a State and for any use whatsoever. I beg of Senators not to load this bill down with amendments, which will insure its defeat either in the other branch of Congress or by an Executive veto.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Does not the Senator think that the other $300,000,000 bill should be added to this bill as an amendment, so as to assure its consideration?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is a very excellent suggestion, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my understanding that it is the intention of the Senator from New York to move an amendment incorporating the $300,000,000 bill, which was separated and passed some days ago, as an amendment to this bill, so as to be sure it will be in conference.

Mr. WAGNER. That is my intention, and I have had the amendment printed for the information of the Senate.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to say a few words about the amendment. I am very sorry the Senator from Mississippi has modified his amendment as he has done.

Mr. HARRISON. I did it at the instance of some of my colleagues, and may I say that if it is voted down in its present form I shall offer it in its original form. All I want to do is to get the greatest number of votes, in order that it may be adopted.

Mr. COPELAND. Well, Mr. President, if it shall be adopted without any restriction or definition of its purpose, it will be so obscure in its administration that I fear it will not accomplish what its author has in mind.

Mr. President, I should like to have Senators appreciate that the hospital situation in America is very distressing. Last year there were 7,000,000 patients in hospitals; 15 per cent of them, over 1,000,000, were charity patients, absolutely without any means of self-help, and their care was provided by the hospital. It is more and more difficult, as Senators can realize, for hospitals to gain any public contributions, and I have no question that it is extremely necessary in this relief bill, which seeks to serve the unemployed and seeks to save them from starvation and illness and death, that there should be a provision such as the kind-hearted Senator from Mississippi has proposed.

I myself shall be extremely sorry if the limitations placed upon the appropriation as originally presented to us by the Senator shall be modified, because every good citizen wants our schools to be operated and he wants the hospitals to be maintained. They are just as necessary as are fire departments and fire apparatus; they are just as necessary as are the police and are just as necessary as any welfare activity can possibly be. I appeal to the Senator from Mississippi to leave his amendment in its original form.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi, as modified, to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield to me for a request in his time?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on reflection, I think the amendment is stronger in its original form than if modified. So, if it be necessary, I ask unanimous consent to offer the amendment in its original form, the fund being restricted to education and hospitalization purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the objection made to this amendment by the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], as well as by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], under ordinary circumstances, it seems to me, would be entitled to great weight, and perhaps would be persuasive. Their objection to it is that it is contrary to the real object of the bill we are considering. I think that is conceded. If the committee behind this bill, the committee that framed it, had followed that doctrine which they now undertake to enforce against those who offer amendments, I would feel much more inclined to abide by their decision, but they themselves have overstepped the rule which they now lay down for us to follow. They have in this bill an item of $40,000,000 to be loaned to the Secretary of Agriculture, the object of which has never been satisfactorily explained, or at least there is a great difference of opinion as to the explanations made by members of the committee as to what it means and what it is for and why it is here. That it has nothing to do with the general object of the bill must be conceded to a greater extent, I think, than in the case of the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. Why enforce one rule against us and measure the committee by a different yardstick?

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator persuaded me that that was the fact, and I voted to eliminate the provision when the roll was called.

Mr. NORRIS. That action is certainly commendable; but I was unable to explain the matter in a way that was satisfactory to the Senate. The Senator and his colleagues who have framed this bill have brought in that provision. They put it in before this amendment was offered; and even now, when they see the evil of their ways, they are unable to back out and get away from this $40,000,000 that one Senator says is for one purpose and another Senator says is for another purpose, and the language itself does not show that it is for any purpose, except that it is $40,000,000 and is going to get away.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to ask a question of the Senator from Arizona. The Senator proposed an amendment which was accepted, and the Senator from Mississippi has since modified his amendment. Of course, if the Senator from Arizona insists upon his amendment, that should be voted on first.

Mr. ASHURST. No; with the permission of the Chair, I shall withdraw my amendment, because I have not been able successfully to enlist the Senator from Mississippi. I do not want to injure the amendment, and I withdraw my suggestion.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator from Arizona withdrew his amendment. I have a great many demands from the State of South Dakota and the State of Minnesota to help them finance the farm-loan situation. The State issues its bonds and the bonds are not marketable. In the form in which the amendment was a few minutes ago it would have taken care of that situation. If the amendment is adopted in its present form, it will necessitate my offering another one to take care of the other situation also. Of course, if it can not be adopted in its present form, there is no use of offering any other amendment to assist the States in this respect.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, would the Senator be able to get relief under the $40,000,000 proposition?

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator from Nebraska knows that that is for the exportable surplus of wheat, and can not be used to take up State farm-loan system bonds.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska, in effect, asked the reason why the pending bill carries an appropriation of $40,000,000 alleged to be for the purpose of financing sales of agricultural products in foreign countries. In my opinion the reason is manifest. The Farm Board is the child of the President. It was his answer to the demands of the country that a farm-relief measure should be enacted. The President's plan has been a wretched and miserable failure. The farmers are now in a worse plight than ever before and the Farm Board, after spending hundreds of millions of dollars, finds itself without funds to continue its profligate course. It has on hand large quantities of cotton and wheat, and it has been endeavoring to obtain funds from the Public Treasury to add to the $500,000,000 which was appropriated for its use in order that it might extend credits to foreign countries and thus get rid of some of its vast holdings. Undoubtedly it has felt that the delinquencies and mistakes of the Farm Board must be retrieved if possible, and the dubious plan has been proposed of throwing good money after bad and spending many millions to aid the Farm Board in further experiments in the wheat and cotton markets of this and other countries. An effort was made to eliminate this item from the bill, which is primarily for the purpose of furnishing work for the unemployed, but the opposition of the administration Senators on the other side of the aisle defeated the effort.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. KING. My time is limited, but I yield.

Mr. NORBECK. The Senator should not blame the Senators on this side if, after long persuasion, they have decided that something should be done with the agricultural problem and to help boost the price of farm products, and I appreciate their support of yesterday.

Mr. KING. I think the Senator is in error in believing that their support will prove helpful to the farmers or that this $40,000,000 will prove of any advantage to them or will "boost" prices. It will be lost as the credits extended to China by the Farm Board are lost. The $40,000,000 to be taken from the fund to relieve unemployment will largely be wasted, but it will enable the Farm Board to obtain a credit upon their balance sheet which reveals the enormous losses which it has incurred.

Mr. President, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi. I confess to some surprise that Senators, particularly Democrats, who favor propositions which subordinate the States and place them in the position of suppliants at the throne of the Federal Government for alms and bounties devolving upon sovereign States. Under our form of government the States have responsibilities. As sovereigns the duty rests upon them of managing their own affairs. It is not within the authority of the Federal Government to assume control or jurisdiction over the domestic affairs of the States. It is not a sound policy to have the Federal Government tax the people of the States in order that it may return to the States that portion of the taxes collected not wasted or absorbed in the processes of collection and distribution.

The Federal Government has an enormous deficit of $3,000,000,000 for this year. Its deficits for the coming year will be greater unless a sound, prudent, and constitutional course is pursued by the Executive and Congress. The wealth of the country is not in the Federal Government; it is in the States and in the inhabitants of the States. The source of political power is with the States and the people therein, and the economic fountains have their origin in the States, not in the Federal Government. I fear that municipalities and the States are not maintaining their rights or fully meeting the responsibilities resting upon them and are partaking too much of the view now prevalent that the Federal Government has unlimited authority and inexhaustible resources and can meet all the demands and requirements of individuals, cities, counties, sovereign States, and the National Government itself.

I was amazed at the discussion last night, when two able Senators from one of the richest States of the Union—a State that gave to the country and to the world the immortal Lincoln—pleaded for help, and, in effect, claimed that their State was incompetent to deal with its own domestic and internal affairs. Illinois is perhaps the third most populous State in the Union and possesses wealth and financial resources superior to any State of the Union except New York and Pennsylvania, and yet appeals were made to the Federal Government upon the ground that people were starving and disturbances were imminent that might call for military intervention by the Federal Government. Mr. President, I do not accept this view. The people of the United States are patriotic. They have pride in their States, and I feel sure will meet the responsibilities resting upon them; they will maintain the integrity and honor of their Commonwealths and will successfully meet this economic crisis.

Mr. President, there must be no confession that our dual form of government is ineffective or inadequate to meet the social, economic, and political problems before us. We must not confess that democracy is a failure and that the American people are unable to deal with the problems and difficulties with which they may be confronted. The American character will not suffer defeatism in any field—economic or political. The resources of our country are unimpaired. We have millions of willing hands and stout hearts, and this depression will not disturb the foundations of the States or the Nation. An able Senator stated a few days ago that perhaps a Mussolini was needed in the United States. Mr. President, I do not share that view. Perhaps we need a renaissance of democracy—a reinstatement of the principles and spirit of democracy and a proper application of the principles and policies which democratic institutions inaugurate and execute.

The amendment of the Senator from Mississippi in effect requests that the Federal Government issue bonds and raise money to loan to the States for educational and hospitalization purposes. If there is any one tenet in the Democratic faith, or for that matter in the faith of Republicans who follow Lincoln, it is that the States should control their own schools and manage their own internal and domestic affairs. Education is a function of the States, not the Federal Government.

The people of Mississippi as well as the people in other States will provide either through individual or corporate effort, or through municipal and State instrumentalities, measures to meet the needs of the people. Mississippi has a fine and progressive people; it possesses wealth, and its people have the traditions and pride of great men and women who laid its foundations and who have brought it to the proud eminence which it has attained; and New York and other States whose representatives are urging this amendment are competent to deal with their educational problems as well as with their own internal affairs. Of course, in a great crisis or emergency the National Government may be called upon for aid.

Mr. President, we must not destroy this bill or attach to it extraneous propositions which will inevitably result in its defeat.

Mr. HARRISON. I merely want to observe that it is just as repugnant to my philosophy of government as it is to to the Senator's to have even to offer this amendment. This whole bill is repugnant to my philosophy of government; but we are trying to meet an emergency, and I appreciate that there are States in this country that can not sell their bonds and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation might help in that respect.

Mr. KING. In the not distant future it may be that the credit of the Government will be no better than that of the States. Before Congress adjourns there will have been legislation appropriating directly approximately $5,000,000,000 to meet the current expenses of the Government for the next fiscal year, and laws authorizing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to issue debentures and obligations constituting a charge upon the Federal Government aggregating perhaps more than $3,500,000,000. Senators should have these facts before them when efforts are made to increase the burdens of the Federal Government and to add provisions to this bill which will call for further loans by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which obligations the Federal Government must meet.

The party in power two years from now, when the debentures issued by the corporation aggregating billions of dollars mature, will have no easy task to maintain the credit of the Government. Unless there is a remarkable business and economic revival, the National Government with its enormous operating expenses and its stupendous obligations, will have a difficult road to travel during the next two or three years. I beg of Senators not to load this bill down with extraneous and improper provisions. I have repeatedly stated that the bill before us is an emergency measure in order to aid in meeting the unemployment situation. If we convert it into a pork barrel or grab bill, into which all sorts of corporations may plunge their hands, we will be rendering a disservice to the country and will aggravate the unemployment situation instead of relieving it.

I am glad to know that the Senators from New York [Mr. WAGNER] and Montana [Mr. WALSH], who have played an important part in preparing the measure before us, have lifted their voices in opposition to the pending amendment.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I am not so concerned with the technical features of this amendment as I am with the philosophy that we have been following with respect to making loans through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. We have been making hundreds of millions of loans to railroads and to banks for the purpose of paying salaries, for the purpose of paying operating expenses, and for the purpose of paying taxes and purchasing materials that have not in fact had any relation to the question of employment.

For that reason alone I would not oppose this amendment; but I am opposed to the amendment in its present form because it is obviously offered for the purpose of taking care of a few States which may be in a legal or technical position to take advantage of it.

We passed recently a bill to provide what we thought was aid for feeding the unemployed. We did not designate the exact purpose for which the money was to be used; but it is quite obvious that this amendment does not get anywhere with respect to the purpose desired to be accomplished by the proponent of the amendment.

The proponent of this amendment desires to help some few States, by exhausting the credit of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, to pay existing debts or maintain existing employees. It gives no single individual an additional job. I am not averse to the Federal Government assisting the States or the municipalities in marketing their securities which they are not able to market now. We have assumed a most peculiar attitude, in that we are perfectly willing to use the Government's credit and the taxpayer's credit for the purpose of paying for every kind of activity engaged in by banks and railroads because they are unable to sell their securities, or the railroads are unable to; but when it comes to our own cities and our States, which are in a like position and are unable to sell their securities, we revolt against it.

However, this bill is an unemployment bill; and when I oppose this amendment, I do not desire to have it construed that I am not willing at some later time, if the necessity arises, to provide ways and means of relieving States and municipalities of their maturing securities which they are not able to refinance. In view, however, of the fact, as the Senator from Montana said, that this is a construction bill and for the purpose of providing jobs, I think this amendment is unwise and has no place in the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, as I understand, under section 1 of the bill an aggregate amount of $1,500,000,000 is provided for, of which $1,460,000,000 goes to certain purposes, presumably for the purpose of furnishing employment to the unemployed, and $40,000,000 goes to the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of financing sales in foreign markets of agricultural products—not wheat alone, as the Senator from South Dakota suggested, but all agricultural products. Do I understand that the $200,000,000 proposal of the Senator from Mississippi is to be taken out of this $1,500,000,000 provision?

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator that it would add that much to it? That is in addition to the other provisions of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. So that the $200,000,000 proposal is not to be taken out of funds that are primarily designed for the purpose of furnishing employment?

Mr. HARRISON. It is not.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] suggested that an amendment would be offered, as I understood, by the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], being the same as the bill that passed the Senate providing for $300,000,000 of loans to the States. I should like to ask the Senator from New York whether that $300,000,000 will come out of the $1,500,000,000 provided for in section 1 of the pending bill.

Mr. WAGNER. No, Mr. President; it will be an additional amount.

Mr. BLAINE. So that the $200,000,000 proposal of the Senator from Mississippi, plus the $300,000,000 proposal to be made by the Senator from New York, aggregates half a billion dollars, which is to come out of other funds to be provided through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. WAGNER. I did not understand the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi to be for an additional $200,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. The Senator so states. What I am trying to arrive at is whether this half-billion dollars is to come out of the $1,500,000,000, or whether additional funds are to be provided for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to meet the half-billion-dollar proposals for loans under the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi and under the amendment to be offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, as I informed the Senator, the amendment which I propose to offer provides for an additional $300,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. So that the amendment the Senator proposes to introduce and the amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Mississippi would simply extend the loan privileges of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for these particular public purposes, and new capital must be provided for those two proposals. I assume that is the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], which will be read.

SEC. —. (a) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make advances to any State on the security of the bonds of such State, and on such terms and conditions as the corporation deems advisable, for educational or hospitalization purposes within such State.

(b) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of this section the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $200,000,000. Such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Mr. HARRISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

So the amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I offer an amendment on page 102, at the end of line 7, to insert the following:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall report in detail to the Senate and to the House of Representatives on the first Monday in December, 1932, and monthly thereafter, his action under this subsection.

Mr. President, this would add to the subsection of the bill which provides for loans through the Secretary of Agriculture by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in the amount of $40,000,000, in the language of the bill—

For the purpose of financing sales of agricultural products in the markets of foreign countries in which such sales can not be financed in the normal course of commerce, but no such sales shall be financed by the Secretary of Agriculture if, in his judgment, such sales will affect adversely the world markets for such products. Any loan or advance made by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purposes of this subdivision may be made with or without security, as the Secretary of Agriculture deems advisable.

Then follows the amendment. I propose that the Secretary of Agriculture shall report what he has done.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I was wondering why the Senator did not provide that the reports should be made monthly to the Secretary of the Senate and to the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection to that.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. We adopted exactly that course with respect to reports a short time ago, on motion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. NORRIS. I rather think that would be preferable; but it occurred to me that since Congress would not be in session until the first Monday in December, it would be unnecessary for the Secretary to make the first report until that time. But I am very glad to modify the amendment. I modify it so as to provide that the Secretary "shall report monthly to the Senate and the House of Representatives, or the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Nebraska to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment, as modified, was agreed to as follows:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall report in detail monthly to the Senate and the House of Representatives, or to the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House of Representatives, if those bodies are not in session, his action under this subsection.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be read for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 103, after line 19, insert the following:

SEC. 4. (a) To aid in furnishing relief and work relief to the needy and distressed people residing in the several States and Territories and in relieving the hardship resulting from unemployment, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to make loans or advances to the several States and Territories, for such purposes out of the funds hereinafter made available, under the terms and conditions hereinafter set forth, and in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $300,000,000. Such amount shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories in the proportion which their population bears to the total population of the States and Territories of the United States, according to the fifteenth decennial census. Such apportionment shall be made by the corporation within 10 days after the date of enactment of this act, and the corporation shall immediately certify to the governors of the several States and Territories the amount apportioned to each State or Territory. The amounts so apportioned to any State or Territory shall be available for loans or advances to such State or Territory for the purposes of this section until the expiration of two years after the date of enactment of this act.

(b) The aggregate amount of the loans or advances made to any State or Territory under this section shall not be in excess of the amount apportioned to such State or Territory. Each such loan or advance shall bear interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum. The amount of the loan or loans or the advance or advances to each State or Territory (except the Territory of Alaska), with interest at the rate of 3 per cent per annum upon any unpaid balance, shall be reimbursed to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation by making annual deductions, beginning with the fiscal year 1935, from moneys payable under regular apportionments made from future Federal grants in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads, of an amount equal to one-fifth of the share which such State or Territory would be entitled to receive under such apportionment, except for the provisions of this section, or of an amount equal to one-fifth of the principal of the loan or loans or the advance or advances made pursuant to this act and all accrued interest on such loan or loans or advance or advances to the date of such deduction, whichever is the lesser, until the sum of such deductions shall equal the total amount of such loan or loans or advance or advances and all accrued interest thereon. Whenever any such deduction is made, the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately pay to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the amount so deducted. Such deduction shall not be made with respect to any State or Territory which, within a period of two years from the date of enactment of this act, shall enter into an agreement with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the repayment of the amount of the loan or loans or the advance or advances to such State or Territory with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms as may be agreed upon between such State or Territory and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, unless such State or Territory shall be in default in the performance of the terms of such agreement. Such an agreement may be made after the expiration of such 2-year period with respect to the repayment of the unpaid principal of any such loan or loans or of any such advance or advances, with interest thereon as herein provided. In the case of a default in any such agreement, the agreement shall thereupon be terminated and reimbursement of the amount of the unpaid principal and interest of any such loan or loans or of any such advance or advances shall be made by making deductions in the manner above provided from moneys payable to such State or Territory under regular apportionments made from future Federal grants in aid of the States and Territories for the construction of highways and rural post roads, beginning with the fiscal year next following such default. In the event that any such loan or advance is made to the Territory of Alaska, such Territory shall, at the time of the making thereof, enter into an agreement with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation for the repayment of the loan or advance with interest thereon as herein provided, in such installments and upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon by such Territory and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

(c) Any State or Territory making application for a loan or an advance under this act shall, through its governor, certify the necessity for such loan or advance, and that its own resources, including moneys then available and which can be made available by the State or Territory, its civil subdivisions, and private contributions, are inadequate to meet its relief needs. Any funds made available to a State or Territory pursuant to this act shall be administered by the governor, or under his direction, and upon his responsibility; except that in any State where there is a State board constituted for controlling the financial affairs of the State, such board shall distribute, under the supervision of the governor, the amount allotted to such State. Any sum received by any State under this act shall be held as a special fund to be applied as herein provided by the governor thereof without regard to restrictions applicable to the ordinary revenues of the State.

(d) Nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to refuse to make a loan or an advance to any State or Territory because of existing constitutional inhibitions in the case of a State, or inhibitions of Federal law in the case of a Territory, or because the State or Territory has borrowed to the full extent authorized by law. The amount for which application is made shall be immediately payable to the State or Territory upon the filing of the application and delivery to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the receipt required by subdivision (f) of this section.

(e) Nothing in this section shall be construed to forbid the governor of any State or Territory from advancing a portion of any loan or advance extended to the State or Territory to any department or separate political organization of the State or Territory.

(f) The amount of any loan or advance authorized under this section shall be paid to the State or Territory upon delivery by the State or Territory to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of a receipt for such amount, which receipt shall state that the loan or advance is accepted subject to the terms of this section.

(g) For the purpose of providing funds for carrying out the provisions of this section the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to issue its notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations in an aggregate amount of not to exceed $300,000,000. Such notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations shall, so far as practicable, be issued in the same manner and be subject to the same terms and conditions as the notes, bonds, debentures, or other such obligations issued pursuant to section 9 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Change the section numbers of sections 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9 to 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, and 10, respectively.

On page 109, line 10, strike out the figure "4" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "5."

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the amendment is simply to reincorporate in the bill as an amendment a bill which has already been passed by the Senate providing for $300,000,000 to be loaned to the States for relief and employment. The amendment makes no change in the former bill at all.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The provision of the amendment was in the bill as it was originally drafted.

Mr. WAGNER. I was about to state that this language was originally in the bill we are considering. It was deemed wise, however, to separate it and pass it as a separate bill. I am now proposing to reincorporate it in the pending bill.

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I desire to ask the attention of the Senator from New York. We worked on the bill in committee. We wrestled with many angles of it. It was approved in the Senate exactly as the Senator and I agreed upon it at that time, but we were both aware of the fact that there was no immediate relief in the bill, because very few States have laws that will permit the use of the money in the way the bill is drafted. After securing a good deal of help, I have worked out an amendment which I would like to have the Senator incorporate in his amendment, which will, I think, permit the use of one-third of the money immediately by the governor of the State. At any rate, I suggest that this matter be incorporated in the Senator's amendment. The bill is going into conference. I shall be guided by the judgment of the Senator from New York. I do not want to make the bill more difficult to pass, but I think this amendment will be helpful.

Mr. WAGNER. I have no objection to have the proposal go to conference.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, why not take the Senate into the confidence of the two Senators and have them let us know what is the subject of their conversation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment of the Senator from South Dakota to the amendment of the Senator from New York be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2 of the amendment of the Senator from New York, line 15, strike out the period, insert a colon, and add the following:

Provided, That in any State where no authority of law exists for receiving or using such amount as may be apportioned to such State and in which the legislature is not in session at the time of the enactment of this act, the governor of such State is hereby designated to receive not to exceed one-third of the amount apportioned to such State and is authorized to use and disburse the same for the purpose of relieving distress and to furnish work relief upon State or Federal aid projects in said State.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York accept the modification?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes; under the conditions and circumstances stated by the Senator from South Dakota.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York as modified to the committee amendment.

The amendment as modified to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 103, line 12, after the word "it" and before the period, insert a comma and the following:

The names of the borrowers to whom loans or advances were made and the amount involved in each case.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word regarding the amendment. When the original Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was pending in the Senate I secured the adoption of a similar amendment to that measure. Unfortunately it went out in conference. Today the reports made by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are practically unintelligible because the loans made to various groups of corporations are lumped together. In the case of the railroads, for instance, if it were not for the fact that the Interstate Commerce Commission has to pass upon those loans, no one would know how much a particular railroad corporation was borrowing from the Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

A majority of the Senate has indicated that it desires to broaden this power, to extend it to private corporations who are to engage in these so-called self-liquidating projects. I believe it is very important that the Congress and the country should know what corporations are receiving money and the amount received. I say this not because I believe there will be any resistance to the amendment in the Senate, but because I want to impress upon the Senate conferees the importance of retaining it in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I send forward an amendment which I offer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from New York proposes the following amendment:

At the proper place add:

And the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is also authorized and directed to allocate and make available to the Secretary of Commerce the sum of not to exceed $1,000,000 for the purpose of providing credit facilities on sales of manufactured products in export markets, such facilities to be provided through the medium of reinsurance to be extended to established and existing export credit insurance agencies in the United States and the Secretary of Commerce is hereby empowered to make the necessary contracts for that purpose.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, yesterday I voted against striking from the bill the $40,000,000 proposed to be advanced for the export of agricultural products. Every Senator has received letters from manufacturers and exporters in his State similar to the one to which I shall refer now from Montgomery Ward & Co. They speak of the great difficulty of making arrangements for exports because of the inability to study, analyze, and utilize the information and facts relative to the situation. They say in their letter:

In our own case, we are rejecting, for this very reason, four times as much business as we accept.

Accordingly, it would seem that our Government should provide such facilities to American exporters as are provided by many European governments for their nationals to assist manufacturing exporters to retain their business and be assured of credit facilities and the eventual payment for the product they ship abroad. In other words, a plan through which the Government would provide, through the medium of a qualified organization such as the American Foreign Credit Underwriters, reinsurance on shipments made by American exporters, would very greatly assist them to compete on a more equitable basis in world markets. The direct result of such increased export trade would be the employment of a large number of additional persons in nearly all classes of industry, as well as persons engaged directly in the development, handling, shipping, financing, etc., of export orders.

This amendment has been modified from the form in which I presented it the other day. It is limited to $1,000,000, not annually but the total amount, and also provides that the Secretary of Commerce is empowered to make the necessary contracts for the purpose. I ask that the matter may be favorably acted upon by the Senate and taken to conference. It will then be determined there. In the conference there will be many modifications of many matters which have been presented and adopted here.

I know the objections which have been urged; but the purpose of the bill which is pending is to promote employment and nothing is more necessary in the promotion of employment than increased activity in the manufacturing and merchandising concerns of the country. If we can promote employment and promote the business of the country by increasing our export business, so much the better. In foreign countries the governments have done exactly what is being proposed here and are assisting in this matter. I present it for the consideration of the Senate and once more invite the attention of Senators to the fact that each of them has had innumerable letters from manufacturers in his own State. I hope Senators will bear this in mind when it comes to a vote.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment be read again for the information of the Senate.

The legislative clerk again read the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, this matter was discussed at some length in the Senate at an earlier date when the Senator from New York offered a somewhat similar amendment. I think the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] pointed out at that time that there was no authority anywhere in law for any governmental agency or department to reinsure or to engage in the insurance business. In other words, this is a proposal not only to insure against accidents at sea, it is not a transportation insurance, but it is engaging the Government in insuring credits that may be extended by Americans to purchasers abroad.

To show the inadequacy of the amendment, even if Congress desired to extend such authority, I invite attention to the fact that it provides only $1,000,000, so that even if we were authorized by any substantive law or if we desired to authorize such a provision this would be of no real value, because of the small amount to be devoted to the purpose. In any event I do not think Congress wants to engage in reinsuring or in the insuring of credits extended to people in other countries.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I add just a few words to what has been said by the Senator from Michigan? We have loaned a great many American dollars to foreign governments. We have had nothing but grief from those loans since we made them. In effect this proposal would be to lend the credit of the American Government to private individuals abroad who are buying goods from this country. It would be no different in substance than if we loaned the money to some private citizen in Siam or Germany or some other place so that he might buy something from the United States. If we got into grief with our loans to foreign governments, think what we would get into if we began to pledge our credit and indorse the notes of some foreign private individual.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, there is in existence now what I would call a cooperative insurance arrangement between manufacturers. It is not a money-making proposition. It is an establishment set up by the manufacturers for the purpose of doing what I discussed a moment ago. The amount involved is small. There is a reinsurance on all of these matters that returns only a small profit. It is exceedingly doubtful if any considerable loss would take place. I have been assured that the possible losses might be $50,000 or $100,000, but there is no doubt about it that the export business would be benefited, because by the aid of the Foreign and Domestic Bureau in the Department of Commerce, who have their agents there, they could assist materially in gaining information, and all the active part of it would be carried on by the cooperative organization.

We are seeking in this bill to do unusual things. When we say we are setting up a new agency, we are doing something different. The whole thing is different. I have no doubt at all, from the assurances given me by reliable manufacturing concerns, that this is a matter of vital interest to our export trade. That is the reason why I urge it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I know about the private organization of which the Senator speaks, and I think it is wholly praiseworthy and intelligent, and ought to be encouraged; but the Government can not go into the business of guaranteeing private debts either here or abroad. In that direction lies sure collapse, and I should be very sorry on that account to see the amendment adopted.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if it would not simplify the procedure and obviate disagreeable eventualities if we would give the foreigners the money in the first instance instead of lending it to them.

Mr. REED. Yes; that would be more simple in more senses than one.

Mr. GORE. The Senator from New York seems to proceed on the theory that a baby born out of wedlock ought not to be of any particular concern provided it is only a very small infant. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from New York to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 101, line 2, after the word "waterworks," insert the words "including industrial water-supply systems."

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is merely a perfecting amendment. I have submitted it to the authors of the bill and also to the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], and there is no objection to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment submitted by the Senator from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, but before sending it to the desk I desire to make a brief statement with reference to it, if I may be permitted to do so.

This is a relief bill intended to furnish employment to the people of the country, but it so happens that the State from whence I come is not so located as to be able to get very much of this money. Out of the appropriations for highways Oklahoma receives less than $3,000,000. We have no rivers and harbors improvements, so we get nothing from that. We have no flood-control program; no Hoover Dam; no air navigation; no lighthouses; and no yards and docks; so we get nothing from that source. Oklahoma is limited to highway construction, amounting to less than $3,000,000; to what we can get through public-building appropriations, probably amounting to between $500,000 and $1,000,000, but, at any rate, not to exceed a million dollars; and we will get something perhaps through Army housing, not to exceed a million and a half dollars. So, under the most liberal construction, the total amount that may come to my State, if this bill shall be enacted into law, will be from four and a half to five million dollars.

Mr. President, under one section of the bill the President has the power to select projects, and he will be allocated about $192,000,000 for that purpose. There are two projects in the State that have been examined by the Biological Survey. One is on the Salt Plains, where it will require a dam and some levees to impound the water, and another is on a tract of marshland which will require the same kind of treatment. So I desire to offer an amendment, not directory but only authorizing and requesting the President to consider these two projects in connection with his power to select projects for improvement. I submit the amendment and ask that it may be read.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Have the projects to which the Senator refers in the amendment been appropriated for?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, they would not come within the terms of paragraph 9 of section 4 of the bill, I think.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. They have not been appropriated for, but one has been reported upon and recommended by the Federal Employment Stabilization Board and the other has been investigated and surveyed by the Biological Survey. I presumed that the provision of the bill to which the amendment is offered was for appropriating purposes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No; if the Senator will pardon me, the provision to which his amendment relates grants no liberty to the President to select any project that has not already been appropriated for. Is not that correct, I will ask the Senator from New York?

Mr. WAGNER. That is correct.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then I do not understand the purpose of the provision. If it relates only to projects which have been approved and appropriated for, I can not understand the reason for the section.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The effect is to lift the amounts out of the appropriation bills, or, at least, to give the opportunity for doing so, and to treat them as capital investments.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I will ask that the amendment be printed in the RECORD, and, in view of the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas, of course I can not urge the amendment. I do, however, want it printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma is as follows:

On page 108, add the following to end of line 22: "Provided, That in selecting projects for improvement and construction as provided herein, the President is authorized and requested to consider migratory bird refuges in Oklahoma as follows: First, the Salt Plains Migratory Bird Refuge located in Alfalfa County, as reported and recommended by the Federal Employment Stabilization Board in its preliminary report, Volume I, and at an estimated cost of $80,000 for such improvement and construction, by the building of dams, levees, and works as may be necessary to convert such area of existing Government and public land into such bird refuge; and, second, the Love County Red River Migratory Bird Refuge in Oklahoma, heretofore investigated and surveyed by the Biological Survey and at an estimated cost of $120,000 for the securing of necessary lands and the construction of dams, levees, and works as may be necessary to convert such area of low and marsh land into a migratory bird refuge."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator does not ask for a vote on his amendment?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. No. Under the statement just made it would be out of order.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of Senators to section 8 of the bill, beginning on line 17, page 112, which was stricken out on yesterday upon motion of the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. It happens that that provision of the bill corresponds with Joint Resolution 168, which I had previously introduced. I desire to ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which that provision was stricken from the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I have no objection to a reconsideration, but I expect to renew my warfare on the proposition after it shall be before the Senate.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, what is the request?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma has asked unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which section 8 was rejected.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I should like to make a brief statement. This provision of the pending bill undertakes to create an industrial commission composed of five Senators, five Representatives, and nine economists or specialists in different lines and of different kinds. I may say that it is, to all intents and purposes, literally a copy of the joint resolution which was passed by Congress in 1899 and which created the celebrated Industrial Commission of that day. It was one of the most noteworthy commissions in the legislative history of this country. It held hearings which filled 18 volumes and which are a reservoir of economic information. The commission examined the leading industrialists, bankers, labor leaders, and generally the leaders of thought in this country, and submitted this [exhibiting] as its final report. It is the nineteenth volume of the series reports concerning agriculture, banking, commerce, mines, manufactures, capital, labor, monopolies, and all the serious economic problems of that period. The Monetary Commission laid the foundation for the Federal reserve act; the Immigration Commission laid the foundation for our immigration laws. The commission now proposed is very similar to the Monetary Commission, which made the famous McMillan report in England last year. This has been a common procedure in England both before and since the famous bullion committee of 1810.

Mr. President, Senators ought not to develop a chronic abhorrence of facts. I should like to see some action taken which, at least, promises something constructive in the future. In all this dreary desert of bonds and debts and taxes, I think this is the only green tree that promises to bear fruit.

I know that some Senators will say that the power to legislate is vested in the Congress and in Congress alone.

I accept that doctrine; but, Mr. President, during this session we have enacted a legislative program that did not originate in the Congress. We have received at the hands of the executive department a ready-made legislative program. What were the items in that agenda? First the moratorium, to postpone the collection of $250,000,000 due and payable to this country, a part of which had been earmarked for payment. It compelled the American taxpayers to stagger beneath that burden. What next? We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation measure. It appropriated a half billion and authorized a bond issue amounting to one and a half billions more. It was designed to resuscitate moribund banks and to rescue railroads from impending financial wreckage.

Then we passed the Glass-Steagall bill, designed to make it easier to extend credit, to obtain credit, and to wade farther and farther into the quicksands of bankruptcy. All these measures were received ready made from the hands of the Executive Department.

What has been the burden of our legislative program at this session? We have issued bonds, bonds, bonds—billions of bonds; we have created debts, debts, debts—billions of debts; we have levied taxes, taxes, taxes—billions of taxes. Smelling salts, stimulants, opiates, embalming fluid—all. What has been the result of our legislative program? Conditions have grown worse day by day. The day the Senate met on December 7 last United States Steel was selling at $52 and a fraction; on February 19, this year, United States Steel sold at $52 and a fraction; yesterday it closed at $24 and the preferred stock made a low record for all time. On September 1, 1929, on the eve of the panic, all stocks listed on the New York Stock Exchange aggregated in value $90,000,000,000. On the 1st of May this year they had sunk to $20,000,000,000, a shrinkage of $70,000,000,000. On the 1st day of June they had shrunk to $16,000,000,000, a shrinkage of 20 per cent in 30 days. Since the enactment of our legislative program there has been a shrinkage of more than 50 per cent in the value of securities, and the pity of it is, commodities have gone down hand in hand with securities. Bonds, stocks, wheat, corn, cotton, and livestock have been executing a nose dive in the bottomless pit.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Oklahoma has expired.

The Senator from Oklahoma has asked unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which section 8 on page 112 was rejected. Is there objection?

The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the section was rejected is reconsidered. The question is on agreeing to the section.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, it is not a pleasant task to oppose the able junior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], who is a profound thinker and is devoted to the public interest.

The Senator said that some Senators appeared to have an abhorrence of facts. Be that as it may, I have an "abhorrence" of any more commissions, and during the time that I shall remain in the Senate—and I enjoy work here very much—I shall fight the creation of any more Federal commissions and the creation of any more Federal officials.

As I think of the American taxpayer there comes to me the figure in mythology of Sisyphus, who was required to roll a heavy stone up the mountain, and always just at the time when after much labor he had reached the mountain top, the heavy stone rolled down again, and so it is written by a classic poet:

With useless endeavor
Forever, forever,
Is Sisyphus rolling
His stone up the mountain

So, Mr. President, with this abhorrence of further commissions, with the history of the reckless and relentless expenditures of public funds by commissions we have created, it seems to me to be my duty—and I am going to perform it—to fight any proposal to create more Federal commissions.

The Wickersham Commission spent $500,000, and there is not a Senator who will say that its report was worth $5. [Laughter.] Nobody knows what it means; the commission was paired against itself on everything.

Examining the proposition before us, it proposes a commission to exist for two years composed of five Senators and five Representatives. They are to serve without compensation; they will receive only their expenses of travel. In addition there are to be nine other persons appointed to the commission, who are each to receive a salary of $3,600 per annum and their traveling expenses, and they may travel at all times willy-nilly, expending the public money, and, further, in addition the sum of $50,000 is provided for clerk hire, for stenographers, for rents, and so forth, for this commission.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely desire to ask the Senator a question. The Senator has said that nothing came out of the Wickersham report. Does he not know that the Republican platform plank on prohibition came out of that report?

Mr. ASHURST. It does bear its imprint, so the Wickersham report probably did assist in producing one plank in a political platform.

Mr. President, if we are going to reduce Federal expenses, we must begin with commissions. I assert that if this commission shall be created—and the motives of my learned friend from Oklahoma are as pure as the motives of any Senator could be; he is simply mistaken—it will expend about $200,000 and then, in order to print its voluminous reports, there will be required some $50,000 to $60,000 more.

I wish to go on record against this proposed commission, and I now renew my motion to strike this section from the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I understand I can speak on that motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has five minutes on the motion now pending.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, conditions have grown worse since our legislative program was enacted. I do not mean to say that it has failed. I will say, however, it has not succeeded. I do not mean to say that we ought to change the treatment, even though the patient is waxing worse. Perhaps to issue more bonds, create more debts, and levy more taxes is the best way to end the depression and to revive prosperity. Perhaps we have not given this medicine in large enough portions, and perhaps in that direction lies the remedy for existing maladies.

I am sorry the Senator from Arizona has objected to this provision. But he objects to all commissions. He has "commissiaphobia," and I have some symptoms of that disease myself. I do not know that this commission would render any service at all. I regret to see this session of Congress adjourn, however, without taking a single step other than the issuance of bonds, the creation of debts, and the imposition of taxes looking to a program for the future that will rescue us from the economic bog in which we are now floundering.

The Senator from Arizona comes from a State where they have petrified forests. He has become accustomed to that scenery, and anything which shows symptoms of verdure or life provokes his inveterate hostility. The Senator comes forward as an apostle of economy, unwilling to appropriate $50,000. I want to take a chance where there is at least a possibility of making progress. The Senator comes forth now as an apostle of economy. I do not mean to criticize the Senator's record; but he makes an appeal in behalf of the taxpayer, when less than a week ago he voted for the so-called soldiers' bonus, to appropriate two and a half billion dollars out of the Treasury where there is now yawning a deficit of two and a half billions; $1,600,000,000 of that amount is interest yet to accumulate in the future. Whatever the justification, reason, or sentiment assigned for it, it was a proposal to make a pure gift out of the Treasury of the United States and out of the pockets of the taxpayers of the United States.

The farmers in the Senator's State are losing their farms because they can not pay the taxes already due. Laborers in his towns are losing their homes at tax sales which embody the earnings of a lifetime because they can not pay the taxes that are already due. Yet the Senator from Arizona voted to take out of their pockets $20 apiece, $100 for every family in his State. The Senator voted to tax the rags on the backs and to tax the crusts on the lips of hungry children. Now, he rises in his place and, in the name of economy and in the name of the taxpayers about whose interest he is so solicitous, makes a protest, and I fear a fatal protest, against the adoption of this proposal, the only fertile egg in this nest, the only living seed in this garden, the only vital bud that has been grafted on this petrified forest. The rest has been the sowing of dead seeds in a desert that is dead.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I am very glad that the Senator from Arizona has declared himself as against commissions. We welcome him to the ranks of those who have been opposing the creation of commissions. It appears to me, however, that he and the Senator from Oklahoma have swapped sides on this matter.

I do think it would be a mistake to create another commission. It may be all right so far as administering the affairs of this bill is concerned; but the trouble about it is, we can not ever kill them when we create them. They go on and grow larger all the time.

So I must support the motion of the Senator from Arizona; but I am somewhat surprised at myself, in that I have begun to believe all these stories the Senators tell on the floor about the great suffering in the country.

There is much suffering; there are many people out of employment; but conditions are not one-half as bad, they are not one-tenth as bad, as we think they are. The Congress of the United States and the city of Washington are but a great reservoir that receives all the bad news and hears about all the bad things that occur anywhere in the country; and when we stay here as long as we have, we reach the point where we believe that everything from one end of the country to the other is hopeless. That is not true.

I believe I have been in every one of the cities of any importance in the United States, and in nearly all the States, in the last two years. I think I am thoroughly familiar with the conditions in my own State. There is not the hunger that we depict here in our debates in the Senate. There is not the great distress that we seek to relieve. If we will go home and mix around with the people a while, we will find out that we have been carried into a psychological condition which makes us believe that the entire population of the United States is out of work and is suffering.

There is one thing that I want to mention, however. As Senators know, I am against the bill. I said the other day, when it was introduced, that it was bad and that it would grow worse the longer we discussed it. I believe that every one of you will agree that that statement has been verified.

There is one thing that has been left out of this bill to which I want to call your attention, and probably I can get some Senator to offer an amendment to take care of it. I do not care to do so myself, as I am against the bill.

Down home I have an old friend, Robert Rhodes, who is the president of the Citizens' National Bank; and Gen. W. L. Sibert, whom some of you know, is his friend, and they have a lot of fox hounds. The last time I was at home they told me that times were a little hard, and that they were getting along all right except that they did not have any money to build dog houses. I sincerely trust that some one will put a provision in this bill for the building of dog houses for fox hunters. [Laughter.] It probably would be about as justifiable as some of the other amendments which have been offered, and some which have been adopted.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, regardless of the meritoriousness of the portion of the bill reported by the committee to which the motion of the Senator from Oklahoma relates, I think it would be most unwise to incorporate it in this bill.

The Senator refers in a commendatory way to the legislation which resulted in the creation of the Industrial Commission of 1909. The last Industrial Commission was created by legislation enacted during the Taft administration, the members, however, not being appointed until the Wilson administration came in. That, as well as the legislation creating the National Monetary Commission, was very elaborately debated. The necessity for it, and the occasion for it, and the particular field that it was to investigate, were discussed at very great length.

Much might be said, I am very sure, for a bill creating a new industrial commission; but it seems to me that it would be improvident to enact legislation of that kind in connection with the matter that is now under consideration.

I hope, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Arizona to strike out that portion of the bill will prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Arizona to strike out section 8.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the other day I entered a motion to reconsider an amendment adopted by the Senate at the instigation of the senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD]. The amendment is as follows:

Except that loans may be made under the provisions of this subdivision to aid in financing the construction of any publicly owned bridge to be used for railroad, railway, and highway uses, the construction cost of which will be returned in part by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, and the remainder by means of taxes imposed pursuant to State law heretofore enacted.

I now desire to call up that motion to reconsider.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator state what page it is on?

Mr. COUZENS. It is on page 3 of the new print.

The VICE PRESIDENT. May the Chair ask the Senator from Michigan if he will yield to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM], who advises the Chair that he must go to a conference at 2 o'clock, and he has an amendment that he desires to offer?

Mr. COUZENS. I brought this matter up at the instigation of the Senator from Louisiana, because he wants to go to the same conference; so I assume that I am pleasing both Senators.

I want to say that this is the only provision in this bill which provides for liquidating borrowings through taxation. Apparently we have followed consistently the policy that all of the money to be loaned under this bill is to be loaned to self-liquidating corporations; or, in other words, the money is to earn its repayment. Here, however, is an exception where bridges or railways or highways are to be built, and they may or may not charge enough tolls or fees to liquidate the indebtedness. They may charge enough tolls or fees to liquidate 10 per cent, 20 per cent, or 30 per cent of the indebtedness and place the rest of it upon the taxpayers.

It has not been the thought of the authors of this bill that we were going to aid in creating more taxes for the States. There is no provision in the bill to match any of the contributions that are made to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation except in this amendment; and I therefore believe that the amendment ought to be reconsidered and defeated.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, inasmuch as we are limited to five minutes, I shall avail myself first of the privilege of using a little time on the motion to reconsider; and if that is carried, then I shall have a little more time to explain the matter.

I think the Senator from Michigan has failed to understand the situation.

This amendment does not provide that the bridge shall be paid for out of tolls. The constitution of the State of Louisiana adopted in 1928 provides for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $14,500,000. A statute was passed in 1930, the enabling act, which authorized the city of New Orleans, through its agency there, the Public Belt, which operates and serves all the railroads, to make contracts with the railroad companies for permanent toll. That has been arranged under a contract already made, and against this contract bonds were to be issued.

The bonds have been authorized. The constitution has dedicated $7,000,000 of bonds of the State of Louisiana to this project, said bonds being secured by the funding of a 4-cent gasoline tax. It is believed by some of those who framed this bill that this project might come under the general provisions, but the Wagner bill provides that the bonds shall be retired in 10 years. The constitutional provision and the contract made with the railroads do not terminate within this period, because it can only be estimated when the 1-mill gasoline tax will accumulate to take up and retire the full amount of the bonds, coupled with the amount to be recovered from the railroads, which can be determined now. So that in order to avoid that question, it was thought by the attorneys advising the city of New Orleans that this amendment should be adopted.

I wish to present to the Senate this proposition as it is just as precisely as I can and as briefly.

The bridge will be owned and operated exclusively by the city of New Orleans.

The construction is authorized by amendments to the constitution of Louisiana enacted in 1928 and 1930.

The bridge will cost $14,500,000. It is to be constructed out of the avails of $7,500,000 of bonds issued by the city of New Orleans, which are secured by a mortgage on the bridge and a pledge of its revenues, and the remainder out of $7,000,000 of bonds of the State of Louisiana to be paid out of a tax levied on gasoline.

The highway section of the bridge, by provision of the Constitution, is to be toll free for vehicular and pedestrian traffic. It connects up with transcontinental highways on the east and west banks of the river.

Lands for approaches have been bought.

Permit for construction has been issued by the War Department.

Certificates of convenience and necessity have been issued by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Bids received and contracts for construction have been let.

Six hundred thousand dollars has already been spent for bridge sites, detailed plans and specifications, and preliminary work.

Detailed plans and specifications have been completed and actual construction can be commenced within 30 days.

Eighty per cent of amount expended will be for labor.

Fabrication of steel will give work to Pennsylvania steel mills.

Lumber from the far West will be used in large quantities.

Nothing remains to be done to start immediate construction except the sale of the bonds issued to finance the project.

The $7,500,000 of bonds of the city of New Orleans are to be paid out of net revenues of bridge.

The $7,000,000 of bonds of the State of Louisiana will be paid out of gasoline taxes whose imposition was authorized by the constitution in 1930. These $7,000,000 of State bonds are specifically dedicated to the construction of this bridge.

If the amendment is not agreed to, Louisiana would get practically no benefits from the Wagner bill.

Therefore I ask the Senate not to reconsider the vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the reconsideration of the vote by which the amendment was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to, and the vote was reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment, which will be reported.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The Senator from Louisiana offers the following amendment: On page 101, line 13, after the word "charges," to insert:

Except that loans may be made under the provisions of this subdivision to aid in financing the construction of any publicly owned bridge to be used for railroad, railway, and highway uses, the construction cost of which will be returned in part by means of tolls, fees, rents, or other charges, and the remainder by means of taxes imposed pursuant to State law heretofore enacted; and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is further authorized and empowered to purchase bonds of any State, municipality, or other public body or agency issued for the purpose of financing the construction of any such bridge irrespective of the dates of maturity of such bonds.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, a very careful reading of the amendment will, I think, disclose the fact that if adopted it would be the most dangerous provision in the bill. We have gone very far in extending the authority and the powers of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, not only in this bill but in the original act. We have, however, been very cautious not to enact legislation which would provide an opportunity for any greater taxation upon real property or upon property of the States or the municipalities.

It is contended by the Senator from Louisiana that this applies to one specific case in Louisiana, and that may be true. There may not be any particular objection to the proposal for the bridge to which he has reference, but I submit we can hardly legislate nationally for a specific bridge in Louisiana. The language provided in this amendment is such that highway bridges and railroad bridges might be built anywhere in the United States and receive money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation without regard to whether the bridges were to be paid for out of taxes or tolls or fees.

It is true the amendment provides that part of the self-liquidation shall take place out of tolls or taxes or rents, but it may happen that only a very small percentage would be taken out of rents, fees, or tolls and the rest might be taken out of taxes imposed pursuant to State law heretofore enacted.

Mr. President, any sort of bridge could be built under this provision, and I think it is going very far afield to invite extravagance and expenditure by the States, to be paid for by taxes, and its does not come within what has generally been the language providing for self-liquidation, and I therefore think the amendment should be rejected.

Mr. BROUSSARD. Mr. President, the thought of the Senator from Michigan that bridges might be built anywhere under this amendment, I think, is in error, because that portion of the amendment which provides for existing works says "the remainder by means of taxes imposed pursuant to State law heretofore enacted."

One or two Senators remarked to me the other day that they thought that any State could, by the passage of subsequent legislation, provide in any manner for taxes in the future to take care of construction of public bridges. This amendment limits it to bridges to be paid for in part by taxes imposed pursuant to law heretofore enacted, so that it does not open the door for the construction of hundreds of bridges, which I think is what the Senator from Michigan fears.

I have here the constitution of the State of Louisiana, and I have also the statute under which these bonds have been issued. It was only six or eight months ago that an effort was made to sell the bonds. They are ready to be put on the market, but there is no market for them. They have been issued, they have been passed upon by legal talent who represent the bonding companies, or the purchasers of bonds, and the only reason why they were not sold was because the bond market is so depressed that bonds can not be sold at all. This is not a proposition gotten up to meet this particular situation. This is a project for a free bridge, so far as vehicular and pedestrian service is concerned. They are ready to begin construction in 30 days. Eighty per cent of the $14,500,000 is to be expended on labor.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROUSSARD. I yield.

Mr. REED. Is this the bridge at New Orleans?

Mr. BROUSSARD. It is.

Mr. REED. I made a misstatement in the RECORD the other day about the cost of that bridge. I think I said that the plan was to spend $100,000,000 in New York, another $100,000,000 in California, and another $100,000,000 in Louisiana. That was plainly incorrect. The cost is to be about $15,000,000, is it not?

Mr. BROUSSARD. The cost is to be $14,500,000, after the State has spent $600,000. It is the only bridge in the State which, I think, really comes within the object and purpose of this bill. The bonds have been issued, and this amendment is to extend credit in the purchase of bonds from the States or even private corporations engaged in self-liquidating enterprises.

Mr. President, two of the railroad companies have made contracts to use this bridge—the Southern Pacific and the Texas Pacific—and that will mean permanent tolls. The State is taking advantage of this construction to construct a bridge which would also serve the public. That part of it will be free to the public, and is secured by bonds provided for under the constitution. These bonds are ready to go to the market, and there is no reason why we should be deprived of participating in this proposition. I ask the Senate to agree to the amendment.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Costigan	Jones	Robinson, Ind.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is upon the amendment proposed by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BROUSSARD] to the amendment.

On a division, the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. President, I desire to submit an amendment, and before doing so I wish to make a brief statement with reference to it. I intend to propose a brief amendment relating to the expenditure of funds for emergency construction in the Federal-aid highway system. In the old print of the bill it is on page 104 and in the new print it is on page 7, subsection (1) of section 4.

Mr. President, the bill is intended to provide for employment and to relieve unemployment, but the method which has been followed in this paragraph and in the preceding paragraph, though I am especially interested in this one, is to divide the money in such way as to build roads rather than to relieve unemployment. It has been lifted practically bodily from the bill reported from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN], which was debated here in March. At that time it was pointed out that unemployment is practically evenly divided over the United States, with the exception of some of the highly industrialized States like Michigan and some of the States of southern New England, and therefore the fair way to spend the money, I submit, is in accordance with population rather than in accordance with the area of the States and the length of roads therein.

I realize that Senators from some of the Western States would naturally be opposed to this plan, because they get a far greater share of the unemployment relief provided in the $120,000,000 than they would otherwise. As a matter of fact, the $120,000,000 is only one-half of what is really intended. It is practically $240,000,000, because the $120,000,000 is to be used by the States to match an amount now in the Treasury not yet expended which the States have been unable to match. Therefore it is practically a distribution of $240,000,000.

The amendment I suggest is, on page 104, in line 8, to insert before the period the words "except that such apportionment shall be worked out on the basis of population."

I appeal to Senators that if the bill is not a road bill but is really a bill to relieve unemployment, that is the fair way to do it. Under the provision as reported from the committee, having the apportionment according to the old road legislation, the State of Arizona, for instance, gets 1.4 per cent of the total amount of relief; whereas, according to her population—and we have no reason to believe that her unemployment situation is any worse according to her population than that of any other State—she would receive only four-tenths of 1 per cent. In other words, under the bill she gets three times as much as she is entitled to according to her population. Actually, if we took her unemployment figures, she would have even a smaller percentage.

The State of Connecticut, for instance, under the Federal-aid road plan, by this bill would receive six-tenths of 1 per cent, I believe, whereas under a fair distribution according to population she would receive just twice as much, or 1.3 per cent.

I appeal to Senators that if we are really intending to relieve unemployment and not to put in an additional road-making bill, the amendment is a perfectly fair amendment. I agree with Senators from the Western States that it does not help to build as many roads as they would like; but their unemployment condition is not any worse proportionately than that of any other State. Therefore the adoption of the amendment, while not actually giving justice to the industrial States, would far better meet the situation than the bill meets it.

The State of Massachusetts, for instance, under the percentage of the apportionment, would receive 1.4 per cent of the relief money, whereas under a fair distribution by population she would receive 3.5 per cent. The reverse happens in the State of Nevada, which under a fair distribution according to population would receive one-tenth of 1 per cent, whereas under the bill she would get thirteen times as much as that.

Mr. ODDIE rose.

Mr. BINGHAM. I see the Senator from Nevada has risen. I am not surprised. If my State received thirteen times as much relief as she is entitled to in accordance with population, I probably should be rising to protest. All I ask is justice in this matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. BINGHAM. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator fixes his own standard of fairness and justice. He establishes as a single standard of fairness and justice the relative populations of the several States and then proceeds to laud his standard as worthy of general acceptance. He recognizes, of course, that the standard which he selects is not the sole standard prescribed by the statute governing Federal aid to highways.

Mr. BINGHAM. If we were able to do it in accordance with unemployment, if we had any figures we could adopt, I would like to see the amendment so framed that it would apply to each State in accordance with the unemployment in that State. But we have no figures except the census figures of 1930. I think the Senator from Arkansas will agree that it would hardly be fair to take the figures of 1930, since conditions have varied and grown worse since then. May I say to the Senator from Arkansas that in his own State of Arkansas the difference is scarcely perceptible. In one case it would be 1.5 per cent and in the other case 1.3 per cent. If the Senator can suggest any fairer way, I shall be glad to adopt it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Connecticut has expired.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] speaks of fairness and justice in connection with the Federal-aid road provisions in this bill. I insist on honesty and truth and practical statements in regard to the matter. The Senator from Connecticut has made a statement which is not practical and which is not based on the facts. The intelligent application of the Federal-aid road policy has been studied and worked out by the best authorities in the United States for many years.

The Senator from Connecticut refers to the State of Nevada as receiving more than its share. I remind the Senator that the Federal Government owns nearly 90 per cent of the area of the State of Nevada.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. On the theory of the Senator from Connecticut the comparatively few citizens who reside in Nevada should maintain all the Federal agencies, the parks and roads and trails, for the convenience of the citizens of Arkansas and Connecticut who travel that way for business or pleasure. The Senator from Nevada, in this instance, is right. The standard for allotment set up in the bill is that which is fixed by statute and is not subject fairly to the criticism which has been made.

Mr. ODDIE. I am glad the Senator from Arkansas has brought up that point. The State of Nevada has nearly 15 per cent of the mileage of three of the main transcontinental highways. The State of Nevada, having the smallest population of any State in the Union, has to maintain those highways built largely by the Federal Government. It throws a burden on the people of the State of Nevada hundreds of times greater than the people of any other State have to carry.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ODDIE. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. I want to ask, if we are going to distribute the public road fund in proportion to population, why not change all of the $500,000,000 and distribute it in proportion to population, whether we have a river and harbor or a public building or something else?

Mr. ODDIE. The Senator from Idaho has stated the matter in a very logical way. The bill has been worked out by the best authorities that are known, after many years of careful study and hard work, and I do not believe the Senate of the United States can afford at this late day to change this existing policy and system which has been proven to be practical and wise. The basis of population as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut is an unintelligent way of handling the matter. It is an undigested and impractical way, and I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I think this would be a good time to say a word or two about road allotment throughout the United States. The Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] said it is under the old law and that it is fair. I do not agree with that statement. It is unfair to Arkansas and it is unfair to all the States except the big income-tax paying States. It is more than fair to them.

The hard-road building program was started by the Federal Government. The Chief of the Bureau of Good Roads testified that it was started on the theory that the Federal Government would pay one-half of the expense of building the roads. The big income-tax payers in Connecticut and New York and a few other States did not like that arrangement, because they pay most of the Federal taxes through corporation or personal incomes. So they got out and organized road-boosting associations in the States and began boosting for county bonds and State bonds and gasoline taxes all over the United States. They increased the local expenses of the States enormously, but never once came to Congress and asked for an increased appropriation from the Federal Government to pay its half. The Federal Government, therefore, dropped back in its construction work and the State expenses increased enormously.

In 1930 I believe the expense was $910,000,000 for the building of hard roads, but only $125,000,000 was contributed by the Federal Government. In 1931 I believe it was over $1,000,000,000 for the building of hard roads, and only $125,000,000 contributed by the Federal Government. Yet every one of those roads is an interstate highway, a post road, a military road, for the benefit of the Government of the United States. This year, because of the economy howl that went up in the country, I believe the Federal appropriation was reduced to $106,000,000. I will ask the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] if that is not correct?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not remember whether that is the exact figure.

Mr. BROOKHART. It is something like that.

Mr. SMOOT. It is something like it.

Mr. BROOKHART. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that I think he needs to revise his statement. The situation is not fair to Arkansas; it is not fair to any of the States. The Federal Government should do its part in these matters.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Iowa talks about an entirely different subject from that involved in the amendment that is pending before the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. I realize that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. He should apply his criticism to the remarks that I made, namely, that the amendment in so far as the allotment is concerned is fair and is not subject to the criticism made by the Senator from Connecticut when he alleged that the apportionment should be made on the sole basis of population. That is the position that I took, and the Senator is going out of his way to make an application of my remarks that the language itself does not warrant.

Mr. BROOKHART. If we were considering nothing but that proposition, I will say that the Senator from Arkansas was all right, but I am considering now the whole question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator has the habit, if he will permit me to say so in his time, of talking about irrelevant matters. I was confining my remarks to the subject before the Senate.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well; but the whole road question is relevant to this situation, and I presented it on the theory that it was a good time to look at the whole picture, at the whole road situation. If we consider it in that way, the proposal is unfair to these States.

It is said that the other States with the large population ought not to pay this extra tax. There are about 10 States that pay more taxes than they get from the Federal Government, but those same 10 States are getting their income from all the States and they owe it to the rest of the country to pay these taxes.

Of course, I agree enirely with the proposition that it is unjust to apportion these roads on the basis of population. It is unjust to apportion taxes on that basis. Income is the only just and sound basis of taxation anywhere, and that comes from a few of the States of the Union.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I rise to support the position taken by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. This is not a question of taxes, which is the irrelevant subject discussed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART]. This is not a question of who shall bear the burden of building highways. This is not appropriately a question of Federal-aid highway construction under the general Federal aid law and its old formula involving area and mileage to which the Senator from Arkansas referred. This is solely and exclusively an unemployment aid appropriation. It is presumably a work bill, not a highway bill. Therefore, every other consideration is irrelevant except the fact that we want to distribute the extraordinary highway funds it allowed as nearly as possible and as equitably as possible where the unemployment exists. No other consideration has any legitimate right of consultation. Highway mileage and an assessment of areas has nothing to do with this problem. It is exclusively a problem in unemployment.

Now, let us see where we are. On the basis of unemployment, as reported in the unemployment census of 1930, if this road work is distributed according to the basis of the pending bill as drawn, 13 States, including my own State of Michigan, with 67 per cent of the Nation's unemployment, will receive but 32 per cent of the added opportunity to serve unemployment upon their Federal-aid roads.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am afraid I can not yield within my five minutes, if the Senator will excuse me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Very well, I will later take the floor in my own right.

Mr. VANDENBERG. There can be no equity, I submit, in relieving unemployment on the basis of sending but 32 per cent of the relief to the points where 67 per cent of the need exists. Any such distribution belies the pretended purpose of the conjured aid.

It may be said that unemployment unhappily has equalized itself throughout the country since the unemployment census of 1930. I think that is probably true; but, if it is true, we best measure this new equalization when we propose that the entire amount shall be apportioned on a population basis.

Not as a matter of building highways under the Federal highway-aid system, not as a matter of distributing the proceeds of Federal taxation by way of assisting Federal-aid construction, but as a matter of contributing most equitably to unemployment where unemployment exists, the amendment submitted by the Senator from Connecticut, I respectfully suggest to the Senate, comes far closer to meeting the equities of the situation than any other possible method of distribution. It is the fair method and the honest method if we shall cling to our unemployment objectives and not sink them in a collateral quest for roads as such.

I should vote to strike this entire section from the bill if I had the chance. I do not believe in taxing States with heavy unemployment burdens in order to build roads in States with less unemployment burdens to carry. For example, my own State of Michigan's share of this new road cost is about $5,000,000 and its share of the new road rewards is about $3,500,000 on the basis in the pending bill. This same discrepancy exists in all the more populous States with the heavier unemployment burdens. The pending amendment would correct this discrepancy in substantial degree. I do not urge it by way of release from our share of the national cost, because our share will be the same in either event. But I do most emphatically urge it by way of equalizing the benefits, if any, from the program so that unemployment may be served in ratio when and where it exists.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] asserts that the unemployment census of 1930 is a fair standard for allotting this fund. As a matter of fact, it is more unfair than any method that could be selected. I think the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and I agree in that particular from the remarks which he made that I recall. In the rural communities where, during the last two or three years, there has been great unemployment there is no note taken of unemployment in the census, but it is so manifestly unfair to base an allotment of funds for relief on a census of that character that I shall expect the Senator from Michigan to exercise his usual intelligence and recognize the correctness of the proposition that such a census is not to be accepted for the purposes of this bill.

The Senator has also stated that population is the true basis for the allotment. Manifestly, if accurate information could be obtained respecting unemployment that would be the correct plan, but since that can not be done without new and repeated surveys, I believe that the plan of allotment provided in the general highway act is more acceptable than that which would be incorporated if the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut relating to population should be adopted. There is no direct relationship between population and unemployment. There may be, and undoubtedly there are, many communities in the United States where there is comparatively little unemployment. There are other communities where there is great unemployment, and I do not think any wholesome end would be accomplished by agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut. It would seem best to follow the plan that has been worked out after long and careful study in the allotment of sums relating to general highway construction.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I disagree emphatically with the views advanced by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] and likewise by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG]. The formula under which Federal-aid highway appropriations are alloted was evolved several years ago after deliberate consideration. Now it is proposed to take this appropriation out from under that formula and allot the money solely upon the basis of population.

Mr. President, some of the Western States are large; they are thinly populated, and they have great areas of public domain. The Senator from Connecticut may say that the Federal Government makes special appropriations for the construction of highways traversing the public domain, but the maintenance of such roads, regardless of the distance, regardless of the expense, must be borne by the States from year to year, and that should be taken into account.

Moreover, Mr. President, other items in this bill are not allotted on the basis of population.

The Senator from Michigan stresses unemployment as the sole principle involved and maintains that the money should be allocated on the basis of population. What does he say about the item on page 10 of the reprint for prosecuting flood-control projects involving $15,500,000? What does he say about the Boulder Dam item involving $10,000,000? What does he say about the item for constructing and purchasing and equipping lighthouse tenders and lighthouse vessels for the Lighthouse Service, and so on? None of those items, Mr. President, is allotted on the basis of population. They are all allotted on the basis of the location and availability of the projects where the money may be expended to alleviate unemployment.

When it is borne in mind that, according to the chief of the Bureau of Public Roads, 90 per cent of all the money expended on Federal-aid highway construction goes directly or indirectly to the employment of labor, it seems to me that this item may well remain in the bill and be in perfect harmony with the purpose of the legislation which is to furnish employment. Ninety per cent of this money will go to employment, thus relieving unemployment throughout the country.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the main objection to dividing emergency road-construction funds according to population has been sufficiently stated, in my opinion, by the remarks made by other Senators. But there is one other principle embodied in the public-works provision of this bill to which this road-building item conforms perfectly. That principle is, that we are now proposing to appropriate money for the construction of projects that have been surveyed, that have been engineered, and on which we know work can begin immediately. Every State highway department is prepared to undertake the work that has been made possible by the funds provided by this bill. The projects have been examined; they have been approved; they have the O. K. of the Bureau of Public Roads in Washington. Every State highway department knows right where it stands. We have our feet solidly on the ground, making no guess, making no wild estimate, but being sure that men will be put to work immediately throughout the entire United States.

It is easy for Senators, as the Senator from Connecticut does, to say that unemployment is greater in his State than in other States. The Senator does not know the facts as to other States. Unemployment is universal in every county in the United States. Wherever men can be put to work on an approved highway project, which has been designed and engineered, that is the place to put them to work. We must look at this matter in a national and not in any local sense. The provision in this bill relating to emergency highway construction contains items which have been considered and approved by the Committee on Roads of the House of Representatives and have been approved and recommended by the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads. In each committee there were elaborate hearings and a thorough investigation. There is not an item in this road provision that those in authority in the several States are not anxiously waiting to undertake and as to which they know exactly where they can go to do the work. That is the sound and the sane and the sensible way to proceed, without guesswork, without changing any general plan, without in any manner departing from what is the regular, well-established, and precedented way of constructing roads in the United States.

Mr. GLENN. Mr. President, I realize how hopeless it is to make the change which has been suggested by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM]. I know where this money is coming from, and I know where a large part of it is going.

If this is a distress measure, if it is a project to relieve suffering humanity, it seems to me there is, or should be, enough intelligence in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to find out where this distress is chiefly located.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. GLENN. Just a moment. I do not believe that it should be distributed according to population, or according to this old plan which was enacted without having in view at all this emergency distress situation.

The only sound and proper basis for distributing unemployment emergency relief funds is to find where that distress is and take the money there. It can be done. I do not care what State it goes to, or what section of the country; I know it will not go to the rural sections as largely as it will to the industrial sections.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. GLENN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would the Senator take into consideration, in allotting the money on the basis of need, the allotments made to other States out of the self-liquidating corporations?

Mr. GLENN. I do not know about the self-liquidating propositions. I would take this as my proposal: Allow the Reconstruction Finance Corporation to seek out unemployment and distress, find where this money is most needed, and spend the money there. I do not care where it is, but I do not believe it will be in Arizona or in Alabama or in rural sections so largely in proportion to their population as it will be in the industrial centers.

We had a little experience with this matter. We have had an emergency relief issue in Illinois. They studied the situation there and were ready to deal fairly with every section of our State from which the calls come. We found that about 90 per cent of the demands to relieve distress and abject privation and suffering came not from the rural sections of Illinois but from the great industrial part of our State.

The same thing will apply in a nation-wide survey, I believe. Little of this money will go into such States as Arkansas and New Mexico. By the way, one of the most distinguished citizens of that proud State said to me within the last two weeks, "I am glad to say to you that we in New Mexico do not know what suffering and distress is as compared to Chicago and Detroit and the great industrial centers of America." I can give his name, but I will not do it. I think his statement is true.

If we are seeking to relieve distress and suffering, let us allow a nonpolitical, an impartial, a competent body to make a survey of unemployment and distress, and let them allocate this fund, not to build roads through national parks or in any State because they want roads there, but allocate it where it is most needed, where the most distress is, where the most starvation exists.

I do not care who makes that survey. I do not care where the money goes, except that every dollar that goes shall go where it is most needed for the purposes for which we all pretend we are voting this appropriation—not to construct roads but to save suffering people in every section of the country.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BINGHAM] to the amendment of the committee.

So Mr. BINGHAM's amendment to the amendment of the committee was rejected.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will report the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 112, following line 16, the Senator from New Hampshire proposes to add a new paragraph, as follows:

The initiation and carrying out of the program of public works authorized by this title shall be subject to the determination by the President, upon advice of the Federal Reserve Board, that such a program will not be detrimental to the financial interests of the Government; and the initiation of the particular items of all public works under this title shall be subject to determination by the President that the particular works are in such localities and of such character as will provide substantial relief to unemployment, such determination to be made upon the advice of a joint advisory committee, hereby created, comprising the Chief of Engineers, the Director of the Federal Stabilization Board, and the Supervising Architect of the Treasury.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, yesterday I offered an amendment which raised the question of cleavage on a matter of general policy in connection with this title of the bill as affecting public works to be carried forward under a special emergency budget to be financed out of a special bond issue.

These features of the bill seem to me most unsound; they seem to me to be creating a new system of Federal financing; they seem to me to be thrusting into the system of Treasury operations a factor likely to produce great confusion and much disadvantage in the normal operations of the Treasury. That amendment, however, was decisively rejected by the Senate, the Senate apparently taking the point of view that the policy should be indorsed of carrying forward this great program of public works.

The amendment which I now offer, Mr. President, raises the question whether that program of public works shall be carried forward with some degree of discretion; in other words, whether the Senate intends to lay definitely and affirmatively upon the Treasury the burden of the type of financing of which I speak, and in the sum which the bill carries, or whether this program is to be carried forward in such wise as to assure the relief of unemployment in those communities which most need it, and whether an orderly practice is to be pursued with reference to the entire program which the bill provides.

If this amendment should be agreed to, many Senators will find themselves looking with ameliorated view upon the measure as it now stands, loaded as it has been from the beginning of its consideration here with dozens of amendments which seriously interfere with its central purpose.

If the amendment is not agreed to, the Treasury will be thrust into a novel method of financing, and in a manner which probably will interfere greatly, perhaps disastrously, with the great operations already laid upon the Treasury.

Mr. President, I would like to ask now whether the yeas and nays upon this amendment may be considered as ordered?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the yeas and nays are ordered.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MOSES. My time has expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is recognized.

Mr. BORAH. I do not desire the floor; I wanted to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, this amendment is in every practical way the exact equivalent of the amendment which the Senator from New Hampshire offered yesterday, and which this body rejected by a vote of 19 to 57.

In the pending amendment it is provided that—

The initiation and carrying out of the program of public works authorized by this title shall be subject to the determination by the President—

And so forth.

It is well known that the President does not favor the incorporation of any public works in this bill, and it is just another method of defeating the public-works provision by vesting this authority in the President to determine whether it shall be proceeded with.

The same is true respecting the selection of the projects for construction. It gives the President authority, first, to refrain from proceeding with the program; and second, to select such projects as he finds, after consulting with an advisory committee, will be calculated to relieve unemployment most directly and promptly.

Manifestly, if the Congress should give that authority to the Chief Executive, there would be no public-works program. There would be accomplished just exactly what the Senator from New Hampshire failed to accomplish when he offered his amendment yesterday to strike language from the bill.

For that reason, therefore, Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE (when Mr. CUTTING's name was called). If the junior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. GLENN (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made on the last vote, I withhold my vote.

So the amendment proposed by Mr. MOSES to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I send to the desk two amendments and ask their separate consideration. They are simply amendments to complete the House text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the first amendment be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 66 insert between lines 6 and 7 the following:

Ocean City Harbor and Inlet and Sinepuxent Bay, Md., Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 38, Seventy-second Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHIEF CLERK. The second amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland is, on page 68, between lines 12 and 13, to insert:

Upper Thoroughfare, Deals Island, Md., Rivers and Harbors Committee Document No. 37, Seventy-second Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 110, line 2, after the period insert:

A sum not exceeding one-tenth of 1 per cent of the amount of bonds herein authorized is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expenses of preparing and advertising and issuing the same.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment to the amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 111, line 17, after "6," insert "(a)."

On page 111, after line 23, insert the following new paragraph:

(b) The term "highway," as defined in the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, shall be deemed to include such main State parkways as may be designated by any State and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture as part of the Federal-aid highway system.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, this is merely a technical amendment, which permits the Secretary of Agriculture to include in the Federal-aid highway system our park roads in the State of New York. I understand there is no objection to it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, the question arises in my mind whether this is an amendment of the highway act. I have no objection, so far as I am concerned, and yet I would not like to amend the general highway act here without some discussion and some explanation.

Mr. WAGNER. It is an amendment to this bill. It simply provides——

Mr. NORRIS. I understand what it provides, I think, but I want to be clear that we are not trying now to amend the general highway act as a permanent law.

Mr. WAGNER. It seems to me this is not a controversial question at all. The park roads are part of our highway system, but the State of New York has hesitated to include them in the highway system for Federal aid. The Secretary of Agriculture has been quite willing to include them, except that he feared he did not have the legislative authority to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has not yet answered my question. Perhaps I have not made it clear or perhaps he does not understand it because I have not made it clear. I invite his attention to the fact that I am not objecting if the amendment applies to this bill only and is not in legal effect an amendment to the general highway act. I do not know anything about the merits of the matter, but I would not like here to include it improperly. It seems to me improper for us to amend here another act.

Mr. WAGNER. I agree with the Senator, and I have no such intention.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us have the amendment reported again.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the amendment would amend the highway act of 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported again.

The Chief Clerk again read the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, the Senator is correct. I suggest an amendment by inserting the words "for the purpose of administering this act."

Mr. NORRIS. Or "for the purpose of this act only."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator modifies his amendment. Let it be read as modified so there will be no mistake about it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, is there any reason why we should include one park and not all the other parks?

Mr. WAGNER. It is a general amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. A general amendment for the one park.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment as modified be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The latter part of the amendment is, on page 111, after line 23, insert the following new paragraph:

(b) The term "highway," defined in the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921, as amended and supplemented, for the purposes of this act only shall be deemed to include such main State parkways as may be designated by any State and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture as part of the Federal-aid highway system.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to offer the amendment to the amendment, which I now send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 101, line 3, before the period insert a semicolon and the following:

And (3) to private limited dividend corporations to aid in the protection and development of forests and other renewable natural resources which are regulated by a State or political subdivision of a State and are self-liquidating in character.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senator from New York has examined the amendment and I think there is no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. BROOKHART] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I send to the desk the following amendment, which I offer.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let the amendment to the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 101, after line 17, insert:

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to loan to limited-dividend corporations, authorized to make loans to unemployed persons who have heretofore worked on a farm and who desire to return to the farm. Said loans shall bear a rate of interest not to exceed 5 per cent per annum, and to be secured by mortgages on the land and stock bought with the money borrowed.

Said loans may be made for a period of 20 years, and the first installment on the principal may be made due three years after the date of the loan.

The loan may include a sufficient amount necessary for food and feed until a crop can be harvested.

Loans shall be limited to $1,000 to individual borrowers.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized to make rules and regulations for making said individual loans, and unless borrowing limited-dividend corporations comply with the same the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall not grant loans to such applicants.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, when the former $300,000,000 relief bill was pending before the Senate, I presented an amendment of this nature. I submitted some observations and my views at that time. Even if I had unlimited time now, I would not want to review what was said then. It was suggested, however, that this bill would be the appropriate place for the subject. I have no illusions, after observing the positions of various Senators here for the last three days, about the disposition of the amendment by the Senate. But I do hope to bring to the attention of the Senate, at least, for their future consideration the absolute necessity of dealing with this problem.

Unemployment has increased in the cities, and a very large number of men are out of employment in the industrial centers who have moved there from the farms within the last 10 years to work in industry. Now that employment in industry has disappeared. They are left in the cities in that condition. They have no rural homes to which they may return. I submit, Mr. President, when one takes a limited survey even of the unbalanced condition between rural and urban population, when one observes the very large number in the industrial centers who probably will not for many years to come again secure employment in industry, he must realize that further attention and thought must be given to the subject of moving and aiding in moving, either through Federal channels or otherwise, a large number who can at least make a living out of the ground for themselves and their families.

Mr. President, just for illustration, in 1910 the rural population in round figures was 49,800,000 and the urban population 42,800,000, a majority of 7,600,000 in favor of rural population. In 1913 the shift was so great that instead of there being a majority of rural population there was a majority of 15,700,000 of urban population. It is apparent that in some way there must be a movement back to the soil. I submit that there is nothing in the unemployment measure which tends in any way to secure any form of permanent relief except the suggestion contained in the amendment which I have offered. Every other part of it contemplates a temporary job. When that work is completed, those men will be back again on the unemployment list. But every man who formerly worked upon a farm and knows how to build a barn and other buildings would be permanently removed from the great mass of unemployed and would have a little place in which he may keep his family inviolate, if my amendment shall be adopted.

I submit that further attention must be given by the public authorities to that question. We can not ever establish relations whereby all who are now in the cities may find industrial employment, so we must at least take some survey of the future and give some consideration to a permanent readjustment of the unbalanced condition that now exists between rural and urban population.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I take it, the Senator has introduced the amendment merely to call the attention of the Senate to this very important question of "back to the soil." I think the Senator himself appreciates that it is not related to the problem with which we are trying to deal in the legislation now pending.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; I do not admit that.

Mr. WAGNER. I contend it is not. It is foreign to that subject. It is a tremendous problem in itself. I sympathize with the Senator's efforts. Undoubtedly in a very short time the Federal Government must in some way assist in the movement of bringing families back to the farms. But the amendment does not relate to the subject with which we are dealing, and I hope it will be rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 100, line 25, it is proposed to strike out the word "and," and on page 101, line 3, before the period, to insert a semicolon and the following:

And (3) to make loans to the Federal Farm Board, which board is hereby authorized to contract for such loans and to pledge as collateral security therefor documents evidencing loans from its revolving fund, and all money so received by the Federal Farm Board shall be deposited in such revolving fund.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, in substance, the amendment merely authorizes the Farm Board to borrow money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and authorizes that corporation to loan money to the Farm Board. It seems that in the legislation pending here we have authorized nearly every other Government organization to do business with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but the one Government agency that has to do with the cooperative agricultural organizations of the country has no such authority. I submit the amendment for the consideration of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 109, at the end of line 19, it is proposed to add the following proviso:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury, within his discretion, shall have the power to issue bonds covering all or any part of the bonds herein authorized to be issued bearing interest payable semiannually at the rate of 2 per cent per annum, and such bonds so issued shall have the rights and privileges accorded by law to other 2 per cent bonds of the United States.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, this amendment proposes to extend the powers of the Secretary of the Treasury in financing and raising the $500,000,000 emergency fund. Under the terms of this bill the Secretary must issue bonds and sell them to some one who will buy them; he has the power to fix the rate of interest at not to exceed 4½ per cent. This amendment proposes to give the Secretary the right to change the form of the bonds from regular 4½ per cent bonds to 2 per cent consols.

Under existing law we have three outstanding bond issues drawing only 2 per cent. These issues have the circulating privilege, and all national-bank money is based upon these 2 per cent consols. A national bank can buy such bonds, send them to the Treasury, deposit them, and have money issued against them to the extent of 95 per cent of their face value. This amendment gives the Secretary power to issue a similar form of bond instead of a regular 4½ per cent bond. It decreases the interest rate from 4½ per cent maximum to 2 per cent. These bonds can be sold because the national banks will buy them, deposit them, obtain 2 per cent interest on them while they are in the Treasury, and secure 95 per cent of the face value of the bonds in money, which they may loan to their depositors and customers.

I suggest the amendment in order to widen and broaden the power of the Secretary. I submit the amendment, Mr. President, and hope that it will be adopted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the trouble with this country now is not a lack of currency; it is a lack of business to use that currency. We have outstanding now more currency than we had when business was going at three times its present rate.

I have examined the Senator's amendment with an effort to view it with sympathy, but I am afraid that the power it proposes to grant is too great to be put in the hands of any Secretary of the Treasury, and I am regretfully forced to vote against the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to come in on page 112.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 112 it is proposed to insert as section 8 (a) the following:

SEC. 8. (a) That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal highway act, approved November 9, 1921 (42 Stat. 212; Code of Laws of the United States, p. 665), and all acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, and to establish post roads, provide for the common defense and general welfare, there is hereby authorized and directed to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as the Congress may from time to time deem advisable to be expended in the improvement of rural post roads over which rural carriers travel in serving the rural routes in addition to those roads now or hereafter to be included in the Federally aided road system.

(b) The sums of money appropriated by Congress under authority of this section for road construction purposes shall be apportioned by the Secretary of Agriculture of the United States among the several States in proportion to the total mileage of rural routes within the respective States and shall be available only when and upon condition that the several States, or subdivisions therein, or both, appropriate and make available an equal sum exclusively for the same purpose. The expenditure of all such sums of money shall be made by the highway departments of the several States or by the equivalent office or officer thereof, as provided in the Federal highway act of November 9, 1921.

(c) That section 6 of said Federal highway act is hereby amended, authorizing and creating a third class of highways to consist of both those intracounty and intercounty highways over which passes the United States mail by rural mail carriers, first selecting and improving those roads which shall most usefully and conveniently contribute to rounding out and expanding the system of primary and secondary highways, and to continue enlarging and expanding until all rural mail routes shall be improved in the manner decided by the respective State highway departments: Provided, That in selecting and improving rural mail roads, as provided herein, due consideration shall be given roads which shall best serve the agricultural needs of the country in obtaining access to the Federal-aid system, the rail and water shipping points, and the markets.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, this amendment does not propose to take any of the money appropriated or authorized in this bill, nor does it add anything to the amount provided in this bill. It does inaugurate, to a certain extent, a new system of highways.

We have been expending the money which we have been appropriating for the improvement of our highways largely on through routes and on hard-surfaced roads. In my judgment, the time is here, and, as a matter of fact, I think it has been here for some while, when we should expend a good part of this money on the improvement of the roads that will really benefit the agricultural sections, and especially the farmers. The highways we are constructing now do not aid the farmer generally in getting his produce to market very much cheaper. That, I think, is one of the important things we should seek to accomplish.

This amendment does not contemplate the hard-surfacing of highways, but it contemplates largely the improvement of those necessary highways radiating out from the various points throughout the country, so as to enable the farmer to get his produce to market just as cheaply as he possibly can. It proposes to give him good roads over which he may transport his produce which he expects to ship out to market. While it does not make such roadways a part of the highway system, it does contemplate coordinating them with the highway system. It does not require the Government to put up all the money nor the communities to put up all the money, but it does provide that before any money shall be expended on highway construction of this kind the State or the county or other subdivision of government interested shall furnish half of the money to be expended. It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is a very important thing to develop in connection with highway construction.

The amendment would also furnish labor to the immediate localities where the roads may be constructed; but, of course, I admit, that will come in the future. The amendment does not provide any money for the particular purpose. I was struck with the situation last summer when I was home. I visited a point where they were extending one of the main highways as part of the highway system, and I do not think that there were more than half a dozen men, ordinary laborers, working on that particular highway, although, of course, labor had been and was being employed elsewhere in manufacturing the concrete and other materials. A development along the lines suggested by the amendment will furnish not only better roads for the people, so that they may more easily get their products to market, but it will also furnish labor and employment to the immediate localities where construction may take place, and the people connected with these highways will be directly benefited by this development.

I think, as I have said, that the time has come when some plan of this kind should be developed. It, as I said, will not be a part, possibly, of our highway system, although I can see in the very near future that a development along these lines will lead to the development of the highway systems in the various States so that this kind of highway work will be included in it.

I believe that this is now the most important highway work in which we can engage. I think it will be of more real substantial benefit to those who need help and to those who need good roads to enable them to get their products to market than any other system we can devise; I hope the amendment may be agreed to, that this matter may be taken to conference, and that this question may have the consideration to which it is entitled.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, the Senate by a very decisive vote has to-day defeated a proposal to change the fundamental basis of the apportionment of Federal-aid funds by fixing population as the only factor. The proposal advanced by the Senator from Washington, which to me is quite appealing—and I have made some study of the subject—again proposes to change the basic rule of the apportionment of Federal-aid funds by giving undue stress to rural post roads.

It is a proposal worthy of careful consideration by the proper committees of the House and of the Senate at a session of Congress when State highway officials and the officials of the Bureau of Public Roads can appear and assist in working out the details of such a plan. Particularly it does not belong in this emergency relief bill, because, as I have stated before, this bill is designed to do road construction already planned.

The State highway departments have had no jurisdiction at all over this type of rural roads. If it is proposed to improve rural highways, it means in some places widening the roadways; in other places, taking out curves; in still other places, reducing grades, and so on, all of which projects have to be carefully studied. Rights of way in some instances will also have to be purchased. If money were appropriated for such purpose by this bill, in all human probability a year or more would elapse before any large amount of work could be done, whereas the appropriations now in the bill are all for engineered projects. So, Mr. President, there are two substantial reasons why the amendment now proposed does not belong in this bill.

I will say to the Senator from Washington, in all frankness, that whatever the merit of his proposal, it should be worked out in detail by committees rather than by being accepted in a hurried way on the floor of the Senate. For these reasons, I am compelled to oppose the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to suggest to the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], who is in charge of the bill in the absence of the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], these matters which have just been called to my attention.

It was suggested to me that on page 108, line 8, after "Secretary of the Treasury," there ought to be inserted "and the Postmaster General," so that it will read:

For emergency construction of public buildings projects in the continental United States outside of the District of Columbia, to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General—

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think that is quite right.

Mr. JONES. So I move to insert, after the word "Treasury," the words "and the Postmaster General."

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is the way the selection is now made. We have no desire to change it. I think the amendment should be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, it was also suggested that the following amendment should be made:

In line 12, on page 108, the bill reads:

Such projects shall be constructed within the estimated limit of cost specified in such document—

Referring to House Document No. 788. It was suggested that after the word "within," in line 12, the words "the estimated limit of cost specified in such document, and" should be stricken out, and the following words inserted after "within":

A limit of cost to be approved by the Director of the Budget.

That suggestion was made, too.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I really can not see any reason for that. The House document not only lists the projects, but lists the estimated cost of them; and that, of course, has been carefully worked by the representatives of the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JONES. I desire to state to the Senator that it was suggested to me that the data furnished in that document are not very reliable at this time. I thought it might be well to get the matter in conference, so that that proposition might be well considered. I frankly say I do not know, but I make that suggestion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I should very much object to putting into the hands of the Director of the Budget the matter of determining the limit of cost of these buildings. It does not seem to me that the office of the Director of the Budget is equipped for that purpose.

The Office of the Supervising Architect of the Treasury is a branch of the Treasury Department. It, of course, is equipped to determine costs with a reasonable degree of accuracy. The Post Office Department has had the supervision of the construction of most of the buildings, at least those that are used primarily for post-office purposes, and that department has experience in estimating costs in various ways. I do not know that the Bureau of the Budget has any means whatever of ascertaining these costs. I can not think that that would be a wise change to make in the bill.

Mr. JONES. I think there is very considerable force in the suggestion of the Senator. I will not press the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, on page 101, line 1, the word "docks" appears. I inquire of the Senator from Montana whether the word "docks" in line 1 includes docks that may be built by the shipping companies that have received and still are receiving huge subsidies from the Treasury of the United States. If these corporations may resort to the fund to be provided by the bill before us, then the word "docks" should be eliminated. I am unwilling that credits shall be extended by this bill to aid these shipping interests to build either ships or docks.

Senators are aware of the fact that various shipping interests of the United States, private corporations, have obtained large loans from the Government and in addition receive "subsidies" for carrying the mails. It has been shown that the quantity of mail carried by some of these companies is negligible and that they are paid by the Government large sums annually. Indeed, there is in many instances scarcely a pretense that the contracts under which the companies receive these large subsidies were entered into because of postal or commercial needs.

They were intended to be, and recognized, as subsidies, to encourage the operation of a merchant marine. I am unwilling to permit any portion of the fund provided in this bill to be used for the benefit of these shipping interests. To assure this policy I move to strike out the word "docks."

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure my friend from Utah is wrong in his belief that this would aid private shipping interests. As a matter of fact, in the city of New York—of course, I do not know exactly what the committee had in mind—in the city of New York, where these great steamship lines land, the docks are owned by the city of New York.

Mr. KING. Yes; I understand.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, will my colleague yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. I should like to call attention to the very language of the section, which says that these docks are to be "devoted to public use." Otherwise, they do not come within the purview of this bill at all.

Mr. COPELAND. That is true.

Mr. WAGNER. So that private docks are not involved.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. KING. I desired to elicit from those in charge of the bill the interpretation which they placed upon it. If only docks of the character indicated by the Senators from New York may be brought within the terms of the bill, I shall not press my motion, though opposed to subdivision (2), within which it is found, and shall later move to strike it from the bill.

I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah withdraws the amendment.

Mr. KING. I now move to strike out all of line 25 after the numeral "(2)," on page 100, and all of lines 1, 2, and 3 down to the word "character," on page 101, the words being:

To private corporations to aid in carrying out the construction of bridges, tunnels, docks, viaducts, waterworks, and similar projects devoted to public use and which are self-liquidating in character.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am apprehensive that the position which I take will not find support by a majority of the Members of the Senate. This question was debated at some length earlier in the discussion of this bill; and a number of Senators, including myself, signified opposition to this provision, which places the Government in the position of a money lender for the benefit of private corporations engaged in private enterprises and private activities. We are trying to convert the Government into a banking institution or a loan organization to extend credit to all sorts of private organizations.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. KING. I do.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Not all sorts.

Mr. KING. All sorts that are embraced within the terms of the bill.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. All sorts that are devoted to public use.

Mr. KING. That depends upon what is meant by "public use," as this term is employed. Most bridges are used by the public; the same is true of tunnels, viaducts, and similar projects. My point is, that the people are to be taxed to loan money to "private corporations," and that this is done by the National Government. In an emergency, such as that confronting the people of the United States, loans to States and their political subdivisions may be justified.

But to employ the taxing power of the Government to obtain money to loan to private corporations to aid them in their business is a most questionable proceeding. When we provide for the extension of credit to private corporations to construct toll bridges or tunnels or docks and viaducts and waterworks, and similar projects, we have gone further than prudence or wisdom approves, or, in the view of many, a proper interpretation of constitutional limitations permits.

I do not care to argue this matter further, because I know the attitude of the Senate as expressed a few days ago; but I desired to again challenge the attention of the Senate to this provision and to its questionable character.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, near Seattle, practically within the city limits, is the naval air station at Sand Point. That station is being developed gradually. The Navy Department are very much interested in it. They want to see it developed just as rapidly as possible. There are certain works there that are very necessary, that, if they were started, would furnish actual employment for many of the laborers of Seattle.

The labor situation there is very critical. As a matter of fact, the condition that confronts the people of Seattle now is a very critical one. Telegrams have been placed in the RECORD from the mayor showing the necessity of help by the National Government. They do not want any doles or any contributions of that sort; but it would be a great benefit, not only to the community and to the people but also to the Government itself, to have constructed at this air station the buildings that are really needed.

I have secured from the Navy Department an estimate of the cost of the buildings and other projects for which money could be expended there most advantageously to the Government and most advantageously to the community. I do not know just where the amendment comes in the bill in addition to the other expenditures that have been provided for by amendments, but I offer for insertion in the bill at the proper place the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Washington offers the following amendment, to be inserted at the proper place:

Naval air station, Sand Point, Wash.: That there is hereby authorized to be expended, out of the fund provided in paragraph 9 of section 4 of this act, at the naval air station, Sand Point, Wash., $50,000 for improvements to the flying field; $25,000 for a storehouse for inflammable stores; $20,000 for a magazine; $55,000 for an administration building and dispensary; $130,000 for officers' quarters; $40,000 for a pier; in all, $321,000.

Mr. JONES. That is very important in the interest of the Government.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to inquire of the Senator if his amendment is for the purpose of perfecting the text of the House bill?

Mr. JONES. No; it is offered as an amendment to the amendment offered to the committee amendment by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not know just where it occurs, but it has been put into the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. At the end of the bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether it ought not to go in a regular naval appropriation bill—some bill affecting appropriations for the Navy?

Mr. JONES. No more than the items that were put in this bill especially for the Army; that were put in to meet the unemployment situation as it is now. There is a very serious one there.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has this project ever been authorized?

Mr. JONES. Over a million dollars has been expended on the development of the Sand Point air station.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has it been estimated for?

Mr. JONES. Part of these items have been.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the items in the bill for construction work were all taken from the report furnished us by the Director of the Stabilization Board. They have all been authorized—yards and docks and works of that character—and an appropriation is made for that particular purpose by the provisions of the bill. It seems to me, however, that it would be quite unjustifiable in keeping with the spirit of this legislation to undertake to introduce a specific item of this character, the merits of which no one has any information about except that just furnished by the Senator from Washington.

I hope that course will not be taken. I am sure it would lead to the introduction of a large number of the same character of amendments.

Mr. JONES. I certainly hope it can be taken to conference. It is very necessary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I ask to have inserted in the House text on page 62, line 5, after the semicolon, the following:

Gloucester Harbor and Annisquam River, Mass., House Document No. 39, Seventy-second Congress.

In explanation, I would like to say that I have been requested to offer this amendment by a Member of the House. It is only to extend the list of river and harbor developments included in the House text. It seems this report was made within a few days and was not prepared in time to be inserted in the House text.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 62, after line 5, to insert:

Gloucester Harbor and Annisquam River, Mass., House Document No. 39, Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. KING rose.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Utah that the House text contains all of the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, who made reports, and this one was omitted after all the others had been included. That is the only purpose of the amendment. I am not in particular sympathy, as the Senator knows, with the bill as it passed the House, but I do think this item ought to be included if the others are.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall make no comments upon the amendments offered by the Senator from Massachusetts but shall refer briefly to an amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania which was adopted a few days ago during the temporary absence of a number of Senators from the Chamber who would have opposed it if they had been present. I find on pages 17 to 28 of the reprint of amendments more than 100 Army posts and stations listed for which appropriations aggregating millions of dollars are carried in the bill.

Mr. President, in my opinion there is no excuse for maintaining scores of these Army posts and stations. They should have been abolished long ago. They greatly increase the military expenses of the Government; they are scattered throughout the United States from the Canal Zone to Alaska. It costs annually an enormous sum to maintain them. Their maintenance results in dividing our military forces into very small units, so small that military maneuvers are impossible, and our Army, because of these minute divisions is unable to engage in military maneuvers or to properly be trained in the art of land warfare.

Aside from the folly of maintaining these posts with the attachments and auxiliaries connected with them, it is, in my view, wholly indefensible to expend millions of dollars upon them at this particular juncture and to take from the funds that are being obtained from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation the desired amounts for that purpose.

I shall not take the time of the Senate to read the names of these hundreds of posts and stations and the appropriations for each, and the purposes for which such appropriations are made, but I call attention to the fact that there are a large number of these posts and stations in Texas, District of Columbia, Georgia, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Mississippi, Delaware, Maryland, Colorado, California, New York, Indiana——

Mr. FLETCHER. Do not forget Utah.

Mr. KING. I know there is an appropriation for Fort Douglas, Utah, but that does not affect the position which I take. I am opposed to all of the provisions of the amendment and deem it most unwise at this time, and from the fund mentioned, to make the appropriation called for.

Mr. NORBECK. From what page is the Senator reading?

Mr. KING. From the reprint of amendments. Referring to the reprint I find still more posts in Texas, Maryland, Virginia, Arizona, New York, Missouri, Kentucky, Washington, Kansas, California, South Dakota, North Carolina; indeed, in every State of the Union. I think that there are from one to a half dozen or more of these Army posts and stations in each State maintained at the expense of the taxpayers of the United States, and most of them wholly unnecessary.

I notice that California is named over and over again in the list. It seems to be a favorite. Perhaps it is because this year it supplies a candidate for the Presidency.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. The next President, the Senator means.

Mr. KING. No; not the next President but soon to be the ex-President of the United States. Within the past few days Congress has approved Army and Navy bills for the ordinary expenses of these two branches of our military service of more than $700,000,000 for the next fiscal year, and only a few days ago there was forced through the Senate, under the whip and spur of the administration forces, an appropriation of nearly $1,000,000,000 for new naval construction between now and 1936.

I should add that in the Army bill which we passed there were provisions for camps and posts throughout the United States, and several millions of dollars were appropriated for construction and the maintenance of camps and posts. It was announced in the press yesterday that the President had submitted a proposition to the Geneva conference for reductions in the military forces of all nations. May I add that the proposition is a belated one, and not as comprehensive as the proposition submitted by Italy's representative or the representative of Russia; nor does it go as far as suggested by Sir John Simon and Ramsay MacDonald. The Geneva conference met to reduce armaments, and the failure to adopt a plan that would result in important reductions in the military expenditures of all nations would be a world calamity.

It seems to me a strange situation that while a world conference is in session to reduce armaments and military burdens, and the President of the United States has just made a contribution to the work of the conference, that in the consideration of a measure to relieve unemployment and to furnish work to those who are destitute, we should appropriate millions to strengthen and equip and remodel and improve a hundred Army posts and stations in all parts of the United States.

Mr. President, I regret that under the parliamentary situation I can not move to strike out the amendment which was offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, the other day I filed a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendment on page 2 of the new print, providing for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation carrying out the provisions of this act in the purchase of securities, was agreed to. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I am disappointed that the Senate could refuse this request, as it is only a formal one. Every other Senator who has proposed amending the House text to include in this bill something that was omitted in the House has had his request complied with. I do not believe the Senate understood the amendment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am sure that the Senate was confused as to the amendment being voted on.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Every other such request that has been made has been granted. A Member of the House of Representatives came to me and asked me to suggest the amendment.

Mr. FESS. I ask that the vote by which the amendment was rejected be reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Ohio that the vote by which the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts was rejected be reconsidered?

Mr. COUZENS. I object.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move that the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts was rejected be reconsidered.

The motion was agreed to, and the vote was reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, which will again be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 62, after line 5, to insert the following:

Gloucester Harbor and Annisquam River, Mass., House Document No. 39, Seventy-second Congress.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is open to amendment. If there be no further amendments to be offered, the question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I desire to explain very briefly the vote I am about to cast on this bill.

I regard the bill as a totally inadequate one to meet the present situation. I think it will be a tragic disappointment to those who are out of work, and that it will utterly fail to stem the tide of the depression. It is not an application of the theory of expansion of public works to stimulate recovery, because it utterly ignores the crux of that theory, namely, size and timing of the program.

However, I shall cast my vote for the measure, because it will provide a certain amount of work for a small proportion of the great army of the unemployed. I can not bring myself to deny to those few who will be benefited by employment under this bill that little surcease from the oppressive conditions under which the country is now suffering.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I wish to make a brief statement about this measure. I regard it as wholly inadequate; and however we may disguise it, it is at the same time a strain on the credit of the country. Whether we finance projects through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation or otherwise, in the long run there is not very much difference so far as the taxpayer is concerned.

This bill has in it the $300,000,000 for the relief of the needy unemployed, voted by the Senate recently. That, I understand, is incorparted as an amendment. I also understand that it is likely that the House would not consider the Senate bill standing alone. I heartily approve that particular bill, and I voted for it when it passed the Senate.

The bill also has in it an appropriation for certain public works. That is a legitimate function of government. It can be justified. I believe, as the Senator from Wisconsin has said, that the program is inadequate, but as far as it goes, of course, it is entitled to the support of anyone who believes that the Government may engage in a program expanding its public works during an emergency of this kind.

Whether it is wise to continue to spend the public money in an effort now to lift ourselves out of this depression is a very serious question. At an earlier time if a program on a scale extensive enough had been undertaken, we might have hoped for beneficial results from the program.

At this time it is a question whether it is not wiser for this Nation to conserve its resources to the last penny in order that it may meet the acute problem it will probably have to face during the coming months. But since the bill contains $300,000,000 for the relief of the needy unemployed, and since it contains the appropriation for public works, I shall not oppose it. Other provisions of the bill I do not support.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to facilitate the construction of self-liquidating projects of a public character, to provide for the construction of certain authorized Federal public-works projects, and for other purposes."

Mr. NORBECK. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. NORBECK, Mr. BROOKHART, and Mr. WAGNER conferees on the part of the Senate.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar No. 630, the bill (H. R. 7233) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes. I will say that if the bill is taken up on this motion, I shall, at the request of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], consent to lay it aside for the consideration of the conference report to which he referred a moment ago, and also for the consideration of appropriation bills.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, I ask that the Treasury and Post Office Departments appropriation bill be included also.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Of course, we will give preference to all appropriation bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I had presented the conference report and asked for its immediate consideration. Would not that now come ahead of any other matter? I have no objection to the motion of the Senator from Arkansas, so far as that is concerned, except as a matter of procedure. The conference report has been presented to the Senate.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I did not understand that the Senate had proceeded to the consideration of the conference report. It is my purpose to consent to lay aside the bill to which my motion relates.

Mr. JONES. I understand that. If it is proper to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill while the conference report is being considered, I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Arkansas.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 7233) to enable the people of the Philippine Islands to adopt a constitution and form a government for the Philippine Islands, to provide for the independence of the same, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs with an amendment.

COMMENTS ON BILL JUST PASSED

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the 5-minute limit on debate not now being in effect, I wish to comment upon the action by which the Senate, without a record vote, has just passed one of the most complicated pieces of legislation which it has ever been my fortune to contemplate. I wish to point out certain things which the Senate has done in connection with the bill which has just gone to conference.

In the fifth section of the bill there is created a special fund in the Treasury to be known as the emergency construction fund, and the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to borrow, through a bond issue or issues, a sum not to exceed $500,000,000. The bonds thus issued are fully tax exempt, are to mature in 25 years, and are to bear not more than 4¼ per cent interest. A sinking fund is provided for, operating five years after the issuance of the first bonds.

In another section of the bill there is allocated the sum of $500,000,000 thus to be raised to various projects of Federal activity which I shall not burden the Senate to read, but which I ask may be inserted in my remarks at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter is as follows:

Section 4 allocates the sum of $500,000,000 as follows:
Federal-aid highways		$120,000,000
National-forest highways	$5,000,000
National forest, miscellaneous improvements	5,000,000
National-park roads	3,000,000
Indian-reservation roads	1,000,000
Public-land roads	2,000,000
		16,000,000
Rivers and harbors	$30,000,000
Flood control	15,500,000
Hoover Dam	10,000,000
Coast and Geodetic Survey	1,250,000
Air-navigation facilities	500,000
Lighthouse tenders and vessels	950,000
Aids to navigation	2,860,000
Yards and docks	10,000,000
		$71,060,000
Public buildings (unauthorized)		100,000,000
Improvements to be lifted from supply bills		192,940,000

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the purpose of the fifth section of the bill is to create a special or extraordinary budget of $500,000,000 to be covered by the bond issue. I have already commented upon what I think this departure from sound finances is likely to produce, and I now add simply that the theory of the proposal is that, whatever expenditure is to be made out of the special fund, it is not to be regarded as an expenditure at all, but is to be looked upon as a capital operation. There is the further theory that the construction provided for out of these special bond issues as they come along need not be considered as affecting the Government's financial problem or even the general handling of the Budget. I have earlier commented upon that also. Section 4, however, does throw a sop to those who insist upon the balancing of the Budget by lifting out a sum approximating $193,000,000 from the expenditures now allocated in the regular Budget.

Mr. President, the devices creating a special fund or an extraordinary budget can not possibly conceal from the taxpayers of the country the fact that this bill automatically unbalances the Budget by $307,000,000. It creates also a radical departure from an historic policy of administration of the Federal Treasury. No one can tell where this path will lead. We can not hide our heads in the sand and attempt to conceal these facts by blinding our own eyes. The fact is that the unbalancing of the Budget will amount to $307,000,000 this year, and we shall probably be called upon to extend this precedent in another session of Congress through additional special budgets and special emergency funds and special bond issues.

A tremendous effort to balance the Budget has been under way here for several months, backed by a nation-wide demand. The first necessary step, that of raising money by taxation, has been completed in the revenue bill which has recently gone upon the statute books and is now going into operation. The Congress, however, is still engaged in fulfilling the corollary of this procedure, namely, attempting to reduce expenditures in the amount necessary to complete the balancing of the Budget.

It is axiomatic that the Government can obtain funds in only two ways, first, by taxation and, second, by borrowing. All will admit that it is impracticable at this time to raise further funds by taxation. The only other alternative is that of borrowing. If along with the financing now being conducted by the Treasury in order to provide the necessary funds for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation as already set up, and in addition to all this the Treasury Department is required now to undertake to float a Government long-term bond issue in the sum of $500,000,000, the result most certainly will be a depression in the prices of all outstanding Government bonds.

Sound public finance dictates that governmental expenditures for public works should not be capitalized as in the case of productive capital expenditures in private industry. The method of setting up an extraordinary budget covered by a bond issue should not be allowed to obscure the plain results that we are simply unbalancing the Federal Budget by the amount of the expenditures proposed in the measure which has just passed this body. It would be infinitely preferable frankly to acknowledge that an additional deficit has been created by these proposed expenditures and then direct the Treasury to borrow the $307,000,000 as a part of the current financial program. Every Senator knows that a nation-wide demand exists for the balancing of the Budget. If the Senate insists on unbalancing the Budget in the additional amount here proposed, we must be prepared to take the consequences.

The general purpose of the bill, as set forth in its title—that of creating employment—is both humane and righteous; but section 4 of the bill does not accomplish that purpose in any way commensurate with the sacrifice of sound financial principles. The allotment of $120,000,000 of road funds to the States will provide direct employment to only 33,193 men. The expenditure of $45,500,000 for rivers and harbors and flood-control projects will give work to only 18,150 men, directly. The $100,000,000 item for public-building projects, none of which have been specifically authorized to date, would provide direct employment during the fiscal year of 1933 for only 2,600 men. These appropriations, aggregating $265,000,000, will result in the direct employment of only 53,943 men during the next fiscal year. An estimate has been made that the entire amount of $307,060,000, which includes all the public works provided for in section 4, with the exception of improvements which are to be lifted from the regular supply bills, will directly employ only 85,850 men.

In the northeastern section of the country only 20,000 men will be directly employed. This is but seven-tenths of a man per thousand of urban population. Eighty-one million dollars would be expended in this area, representing but $3 per capita of urban population. In the southern section 29,000 men would be employed, or 2.1 men per thousand of urban population. The total of $93,700,000 to be expended in this area amounts to $6.70 per capita of urban population. In the middle western section a total of $68,500,000 is contemplated, with 19,000 men directly employed. This is an expenditure of $3.40 per capita of urban population, with the direct employment of but one man per 1,000 of urban population.

In the Western States there will be an expenditure of $63,300,000 and the direct employment of 17,000 men, or a per capita expenditure of $9 on the basis of urban population, and the direct employment of 2.4 men per thousand of urban population.

The direct employment of 85,850 men during the fiscal year 1933 is roughly equivalent to about 1 man in each 100 of the unemployed population. The unemployment problem, Mr. President, largely centers in the urban groups. About two-thirds of the expenditures which I have enumerated will be for engineering types of construction, such as flood control, which is almost invariably located in rural areas, and often far removed from population centers. In a large part of the remaining one-third devoted to public buildings, the majority of the projects are located in small cities, where it will be difficult, due to labor restrictions, to employ residents of large cities. On account of the size of the buildings involved, construction in the larger cities requires special planning and therefore there will be little opportunity in the near future for the unemployed residents of large cities to secure jobs.

In the case of flood-control work, the expenditures involved will be largely centered in the States of Louisiana, Arkansas, and Mississippi, and we should bear in mind the fact that the Government has for several years past spent almost $30,000,000 annually for flood control in this region.

Another angle of observation is to be found in the relationship of the share of Federal taxes paid by the various States as against the allotment of public works under the bill. For instance, Massachusetts receives but 2.76 per cent of the $307,000,000 here appropriated, while it pays 3.65 per cent of the total Federal taxes. The State of New York receives 9.63 per cent of the proposed public works appropriations, while it pays 27.64 per cent of the Federal taxes. The State of Ohio receives 3.89 per cent of the appropriations, and pays 4.64 per cent of the taxes. The State of Illinois receives 3.58 per cent of the appropriations, while it pays 7.83 per cent of the taxes.

To summarize, Mr. President, the expenditure for public works by the Government of the huge sum of $307,000,000 will provide direct employment for only 85,850 men, or approximately to only 1 man out of over 100 now unemployed.

The fundamental objections to the public-works section of this bill, which I have twice tried, vainly, first, to eliminate and then to mitigate, are:

First. That it unbalances the Budget;

Second. That it resorts to the unsound device of a special fund or extraordinary budget, which introduces a new and an essentially dishonest practice in Federal finance;

Third. That it breaks the historic policy of the Government, and with a new precedent starts the fiscal program of the Government on a dangerous path, the end of which can not be foretold; and Fourth. That it creates apprehension in the minds of the holders of Government securities, making more difficult the normal financing of the Government which is now in progress.

And to all these objections, Mr. President, I may add that the multiplicity of amendments added to the bill in the Senate has created a thicket of legislative programs which will require a corps of administrative and legal guides in order that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may thread its way through the undergrowth which we have thrown up in this bill.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if Mr. Mills, who evidently wrote the speech of the Senator, because he has similar figures in his testimony before the Banking and Currency Committee——

Mr. MOSES. That testimony was available to me also.

Mr. COUZENS. But the speech was written long before the bill passed on the assumption that it was going to pass. However, that is not what I rose to ask the Senator from New Hampshire. I wondered if the Senator could discern in any way a difference between the Treasury Department buying three-quarters of a billion dollars' worth of notes from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and carrying them in the Treasury and the Treasury selling Government bonds direct?

Mr. MOSES. No; I can not. Will the Senator explain the difference?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I will explain, so there will be no misunderstanding, that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation notes are just as much a direct obligation as are the bonds that will be sold under this bill; and if there is any deception, so far as the public is concerned, the deception is in attempting to make the public believe that the money borrowed by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not as direct an obligation of the Federal Government as the $307,000,000 worth of bonds that will be issued under this bill.

Mr. MOSES. I have never understood that anybody undertook to set up that the notes——

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator emphasized that there was some dishonesty about it.

Mr. MOSES. Yes; in setting up a special budget and a special issue of bonds as against the general obligations of the Government.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator said, or at least Mr. Mills said, that that was dishonest.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator from New Hampshire takes the responsibility.

Mr. COUZENS. I know the Senator takes the responsibility for what he has read to the Senate, but I want to say that it is not dishonest to set up a special fund; in fact, it was first recommended, I think, on the floor of the Senate by my colleague, who suggested providing a special bond issue for construction purposes. I want to say that it is no more dishonest to set up a special fund for construction projects than it is to provide three-quarters of a billion dollars out of the Federal Treasury to finance private industry.

Mr. MOSES. That has not been done.

Mr. COUZENS. It has been done so far as the self-liquidating corporations are concerned, because they are private enterprises, although they are under Government or municipal or State regulation.

I also wish to make another correction. The Senator read that these bonds were tax exempt. Of course, they are not tax exempt so far as estate taxes and surtaxes and gift taxes are concerned.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator means to say so far as the recent tax bill is concerned.

Mr. COUZENS. For many years the bonds issued by the Federal Government have not been exempt so far as surtaxes, estate taxes, and gift taxes are concerned.

I merely wanted to make it plain that there is no difference. If one method, as the Senator described it, is dishonest the other method is dishonest; but I am not claiming that either is dishonest.

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. MOSES. I yield.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator spoke of direct employment. Has the Senator calculated at all or has the authority whom he cites informed him as to what the indirect employment would be?

Mr. MOSES. No; I said nothing about indirect employment.

Mr. WAGNER. That is an important matter. There are between three and four indirectly employed where one is directly employed. So the Senator can see what a serious omission either he or the authority whom he cited made.

Mr. MOSES. I am not prepared to admit that; but even if that were right, and the Senator even made the number four, only 320,000 people would be employed, granting the correctness of the figures.

Mr. WAGNER. I want to say to the Senator that when I have read his figures I shall take occasion in the Senate, perhaps, to respond to them.

I wanted to ask the Senator one further question. He referred to a special budget. What kind of a budget does he have in mind? Does he call the budget made up by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation itself a budget of Government obligations? What sort of a budget is that?

Mr. MOSES. I do not understand that under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act there is a special type of securities and a special budget for them; that is a general Treasury operation, as I understand. Does the Senator assert that the operations of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are not a part of the general operations of the Treasury; that the money which they obtain from the Treasury is not earmarked and put in a special account; and that if they issue certain debentures, or whatever it is they issue, they would have to interrupt all the operations of the Treasury in order to do it, as I maintain would be necessary under this bill?

Mr. WAGNER. Yes, that is true; but the Reconstruction Finance Corporation carries its own account and makes its own budget, and that budget is a governmental budget, because the obligations which they issue are Government obligations. Now what type of budget does the Senator call that?

Mr. MOSES. The Senator is trying to set up the maxim that the whole is equal to the sum of its parts, which, of course, is true.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator asserted the viciousness of some special budget set-up.

Mr. MOSES. Of a special issue of bonds for a special purpose. It has been done just once hitherto in the history of the country and that was in the case of the Panama Canal.

Mr. WAGNER. That is exactly what the Reconstruction Finance Corporation now does. It issues bonds, which are Government obligations, and keeps a separate budget of its own transactions. Does the Senator call that vicious?

Mr. MOSES. I have not called anything vicious.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator complained about a special type of budget and the danger that would arise from it.

Mr. MOSES. I did, and I will continue to complain about it. I think that the setting up of a special bond issue is an unwarranted procedure, a departure from the practice of the Treasury, and one that has never been indulged in except in the case of the Panama Canal.

Mr. WAGNER. The Senator cited some figures which were also cited in the hearings before the Banking and Currency Committee.

Mr. MOSES. They probably carry a double authority if they were cited before the committee and I have placed them before the Senate.

Mr. WAGNER. Does the Senator mean his citation of them gives them double authority?

Mr. MOSES. The Senator may draw his own conclusions.

Mr. WAGNER. I did not hear the entire speech of the Senator, but I wondered whether the Senator mentioned the amount of money that the Treasury Department expected to spend under the appropriations provided for in the bill which we just passed?

Mr. MOSES. Does the Senator mean the amount of money lifted out of the regular Budget?

Mr. WAGNER. No; but there is an appropriation of $100,000,000 for public buildings, and the Secretary of the Treasury is given authority to select the particular projects which may be constructed. Under that authorization, has the Senator any figures to indicate what amount the Secretary of the Treasury expects to expend this year?

Mr. MOSES. No; but I have an estimate coming from the architect's office to the effect that only 2,600 men can be constantly employed on these projects.

Mr. WAGNER. I think the fallacy of the figures can be easily enough established, and I will take an opportunity, perhaps, to-morrow, to answer the Senator.

Mr. MOSES. The Senator need not hurry to do it to-morrow; we are not going to adjourn speedily.

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President——

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ODDIE. In just a moment I will yield. I desire to make a brief statement.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. MOSES] has made some statements regarding the number of men who will be employed in this emergency highway construction and other work provided for in this bill. In my opinion, from reliable facts and figures which I have secured, the information that the Senator from New Hampshire has given is utterly erroneous. He has greatly understated the number of men who will be employed. The people who have given him that information do not know what they are talking about; and, unfortunately, I have to comment on some statements on this matter a short time ago by the Secretary of Agriculture, whom we all honor and respect, in which he seriously understated the number of men who would be employed in the Federal-aid highway work. I put in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on March 11 a number of tables prepared by the Bureau of Public Roads and the State highway officials, which show that the number of men employed as a result of the expenditure of this money will be many times more than the number given by the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. President, the number of men directly employed in this work will be increased by over twice the number employed back of the lines. The work those men will do will furnish a market for large quantities of materials and supplies from the mines, from the factories and mills of the country. The system of staggering employment will practically double the number of men that can be used in this work.

I place in the RECORD the statements I made on this subject on the floor of the Senate on March 11, 1932, which corroborate the statements I have just made and which apply with greater force to-day than they did then.

Mr. ODDIE. The President of the United States, in his message to the Congress on December 2, 1930, made the following references to the necessity for accelerating construction of public works:

"The enlarged rivers and harbors, public buildings, and highway plans authorized by the Congress last session, however, offer an opportunity for assistance by the temporary acceleration of construction of these programs even faster than originally planned, especially if the technical requirements of the laws which entail great delays could be amended in such fashion as to speed up acquirements of land and the letting of contracts.

"With view, however, to the possible need for acceleration, we, immediately upon receiving those authorities from the Congress five months ago, began the necessary technical work in preparation for such possible eventuality. I have canvassed the departments of the Government as to the maximum amount that can be properly added to our present expenditure to accelerate all construction during the next six months, and I feel warranted in asking the Congress for an appropriation of from $100,000,000 to $150,000,000 to provide such further employment in this emergency. In connection therewith we need some authority to make enlarged temporary advances of Federal highway aid to the States."

Subsequently the President submitted a communication to the Congress on December 4, 1930, "to enable the Chief Executive to accelerate work on construction projects already authorized by law so as to increase employment," and the following is quoted from this message:

"This supplemental estimate of appropriation is required to meet an emergency which has arisen since the transmission of the Budget for the fiscal year 1931."

Pursuant to this communication of the President transmitting the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget, a bill, H. R. 14804, in which the largest single item was that allocated for emergency construction on the Federal aid highway system amounting to $80,000,000, was enacted into law. The beneficial results of this legislation have been recognized throughout the United States, particularly as to the highway activities which were stimulated by the emergency appropriation.

The $80,000,000 Federal fund was directly and promptly applied through the States to projects throughout the Nation, giving immediate relief to thousands of workers. There were undertaken 2,216 projects, totaling over 13,000 miles of road in 1,227 counties, or a little less ratio than a project to every other county through advance of Federal funds in 1931. This was part of the whole Federal-aid road program undertaken and does not include the work done without Federal funds by the States, cities, counties, or local communities.

Federal and State road building in 1931 engaged directly and indirectly more than a million men. County and city street and highway building engaged possibly a like number. In analyzing the benefits of these highway activities the United States Bureau of Public Roads has found that a very large share of every highway dollar goes to labor. Figures support the statement that from 75 per cent to 80 per cent of the average highway dollar goes ultimately to the wage earner, either directly through employment on the highway or indirectly through employment in industries furnishing materials for the highways. In some instances the portion which finds its way to the wage earner amounts to as much at $910 out of each $1,000 expended for highways. No other type of public improvement gives such a large share of the funds expended to labor. No other type of public improvement distributes the benefits more widely throughout the Nation. Further, in carrying out the State program there was no loss of time in getting the work under way. Efficiency, economy, and high quality of production characterize the emergency expenditure. Needed public improvements were obtained without waste or extravagance and immediate comforts in shelter, food, and clothing made available for thousands of willing workers.

Since the emergency conditions which prompted the emergency measure of last year are even more acute this year, the successful relief measures of last year should be reenacted now. If effective then, they are equally effective now and even more necessary. All arguments in favor of the passage of the emergency construction appropriation of last year apply with equal force to the emergency highway measure now up for consideration.

The policy of enlarged public-works programs in periods of slack employment has been repeatedly enunciated by President Hoover and other national leaders. While a candidate for the Presidency, President Hoover, speaking at St. Louis, Mo., on November 2, 1928, referred to Federal highways as follows:

"This administration has recognized the public necessity of Federal Government contribution to the creation of a definite system of modern interstate highways. This program is far from completion, and I stand for its continuance."

Further:

"As I have said before, these undertakings are justified by the growth, the need, and the wealth of our country."

And still further:

"These works, which will provide for an army of men, should, so far as practicable, be adjusted to take up the slack of unemployment if it should occur."

Federal-aid highway improvement has progressed steadily since this statement was made, but it is still far from completion. There are at the present time on the Federal-aid system 198,967 miles of main road, approximately 7 per cent of the Nation's entire road mileage, and of this 108,449 miles have been improved or are under construction with Federal aid, leaving about 90,418 miles on which no Federal funds have as yet been used. Some of this mileage has been improved by the States, but a very large part of the 108,449 miles has not been improved as yet with an adequate type of surface. The continuance of the program is without question justified, and since the crisis of unemployment has occurred and is with us, an obligation rests upon the Federal Government to carry forward vigorously an enlarged program of needed public works. In quickening progress on the Federal-aid system we are not launching into unknown fields.

The Federal-aid highway system was born of a farsighted scientific planning, and serves as a model to other nations throughout the world. No new governmental agencies are necessary for its continued development. The policy of an enlarged program of Federal highway building was inaugurated by the emergency appropriations of last year; in principle and practice, therefore, the policy has been substantiated. It might have seemed by the limitation of emergency expenditures to a short period that the depression would end by schedule on some definite date. We were inclined to be hopeful. The necessity, however, of further constructive measures is now apparent. Personally, I am convinced that even a larger emergency highway program than contemplated by this act would be justified by the benefits which would be derived, but the amount has been limited to that which we are advised the States are ready to absorb and spend wisely and economically.

The emergency or supplemental amount of $120,000,000 for Federal-aid highways, as contained in the present bill, will provide a total of $250,000,000 for Federal participation with the States in 1932. This compares with approximately $241,000,000 so used in 1931. The emergency fund now proposed for this use, then, is necessary to avoid a recession in Federal road building. It does not greatly enlarge the Federal expenditure over that of the preceding year.

The Federal-aid plan to which we are committed is not changed by the emergency proposal, but the rate of accomplishment is accelerated.

The moneys advanced to the States now would likely be disbursed within the next few years anyway. Advanced now they serve a twofold purpose:

First. They make available the benefits of additional highways at an earlier date.

Second. They provide additional employment at a time of dire need.

These results are accomplished with a saving in construction costs due to the prevailing low prices for road materials and the increased efficiency brought about by keen competition.

Leaders of all political parties have acknowledged the benefits which improved highways contribute to the social and economic welfare of all the people of our Nation. The advantages of lower transportation costs with savings ranging up to 26 per cent, according to road type and character of traffic, and the increased safety which improved highways afford are well known to every Member present and possibly need not be recited further.

The bill we are considering originated in the House Committee on Roads. Its form follows substantially the similar measures approved by the last Congress and signed by the President a little more than a year ago. These facts, together with the passage of the present bill by the House on February 27, with support from both major parties, illustrate the nonpartisan character of the policies which this measure embodies.

In principle and application it is not new legislation, but your attention is directed to a few minor changes in general provisions compared with the bill of a year ago. These changes are designed in the light of experience to adapt it better to the intended purposes. The changes are clearly set forth in the Senate Post Offices and Post Roads Committee Report No. 363, which was carefully and ably prepared by the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN]. They have been approved by the administrative heads of the departments charged by law with the supervision of the proposed projects. None of the changes are contrary to the fundamental features of the Federal aid act.

Mr. ODDIE. The farming industry of the United States has suffered economic depression for a much longer period than have other industries, and, furthermore, there is no doubt that the farmers are still in a very serious condition. The enactment of this bill will immediately afford a partial relief in providing employment and in lowering marketing costs.

The maximum number of persons employed on emergency highway work as a direct result of the $80,000,000 Federal emergency appropriation in 1931 was 115,167 persons, according to a statement of the Bureau of Public Roads appearing in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 4859, in a table giving employment on Federal and State work, 1931. (See attached Exhibit A.) The maximum figures are for July. On July 1, 1931, 1 out of every 369 persons in the United States was employed on the Federal or State highway work. (See attached Exhibit B.) In Maine, which had the greatest record, 1 out of 70 people on the 1st day of July was working for the State or for a contractor on the State roads.

On the same basis the emergency appropriation of $120,000,000 as now proposed would employ one and one-half times 115,167, or 172,750 persons, but since staggering of employment is being very generally used in highway emergency work, this number would likely be doubled, or 335,500 persons would be directly employed on emergency work on the road itself.

For every man engaged on the highway there are two men engaged in the production of road-building equipment and materials in the factories or mines and the transportation of them from their sources at the mines, quarries, and so forth, through the factories to the highway projects. On the first breakdown of road expenditures the item of transportation takes $406 out of $1,000, showing to what extent railroads and railroad workers benefit by highway building. Few people realize the support which the railroads receive from highway operations. These facts are supported by testimony before the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in recent hearings, pages 70 and 71. (See attached Exhibit C.)

Taking into consideration, then, that for each man working on the road there are two men behind the lines in allied industries and on transportation lines, the total number of men engaged by reason of the appropriation alone would possibly be three times the net number of 172,750 directly employed on the highway plus the additional 172,750 road workers alternating in staggered work, or a grand total of 691,000. Further assuming that an average family consists of three, more than 2,000,000 persons may be reached by reason of the $120,000,000 emergency appropriation.

In 1931 the emergency appropriation of $80,000,000 represented 7.7 per cent of the highway expenditures by the States and Federal Government. Assuming that the total highway expenditure for this year remains the same as the total of 1931, the sum of $120,000,000 would be 11.5 per cent of the total for 1932. Accordingly, highway activities would engage on regular work several times the emergency work number. On regular work staggered employment would not prevail to the same extent. The maximum number on State and Federal work in 1931, according to the Bureau of Public Roads statement—see Exhibit A—was in August, when 389,949 persons were employed. Of this number, 102,789 were then on emergency work, leaving 287,151 on regular Federal and State work. By partial staggering of employment and counting again the two men behind the lines, the number employed on regular and State work would probably be in excess of 1,000,000 persons.

However, a portion of the Federal funds would not have been available during 1931 except for the emergency funds which enabled the States to match the regular Federal funds. Therefore the emergency appropriation can be credited also with making employment possible for a portion of those on regular Federal and State work. This would be equally true this year. Frozen State bonds are primarily responsible for the inability of several of the States to match Federal funds. In normal times State bonds would sell at a premium. The emergency fund, then, is urgently needed at this time in the States so handicapped in order that they may proceed with their regular Federal-aid highway construction. Failure to obtain emergency funds will bring highway activity in these States practically to a standstill, adding many thousands of men to the army of the unemployed—men who to this date have been gainfully and usefully engaged in highway building as their life work.

County and local expenditures amount to approximately 60 per cent of the Federal and State totals; therefore at least an additional 60 per cent in number are added to the highway ranks by county and local highway activities.

Since their operations embrace more maintenance work, the number of persons employed is possibly larger even than the direct ratio. None of these figures include expenditures for street and highway work in cities where the annual expenditures are approximately another $1,000,000,000, providing employment in corresponding proportion.

State, cities, counties, and local units of Government all look to the Federal Government for leadership in the present crisis. Any curtailment of Federal funds may be interpreted by States, cities, counties, and other local units as a release from the obligation to maintain public-works programs on an enlarged scale. If Federal curtailment should occur, local units will likely follow the Federal leadership, precipitating a collapse of highway and street work. This must not occur. These operations are too deeply rooted as a useful and necessary part of our entire economic structure.

Finally, since it is conservatively estimated that 85 per cent of the average highway dollar goes to labor, the emergency appropriation for $120,000,000 would make available $102,000,000 as the wage earners' share. Approximately one-third of this amount would be distributed directly to the 335,500 emergency road workers; each of these would receive approximately $100 of the total. This is not a large amount, yet it is an amount equal to the average annual amount distributed per unemployed worker by direct relief agencies, estimated on basis of a statement for the first quarter of 1931, submitted to Congress by the Department of Commerce and appearing in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on page 5429. See attached Exhibit D.

In addition, a large number of regular road workers would be assured of retention in useful work by the emergency funds; the importance of this is recognized when it is considered that a halt in growth of unemployment is the first step toward improvement.

In highway building there is no waste or extravagance. Needed public improvements are obtained while useful work is provided for willing workers.

In reporting this bill the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, has quite properly considered the legislation as a nonpartisan measure, which will benefit the entire country, and I feel sure that the Senate will also consider the bill on that broad national basis.

Mr. President, I present for the RECORD extract of testimony showing use of emergency funds in Michigan in hearings before Post Offices and Post Roads—Senate bill 36—page 26:

"The CHAIRMAN (Mr. ODDIE). What is the effect of this legislation on the unemployment problem in your State?

"Mr. G. C. DILLMAN (State highway commissioner of Michigan). I might say that about the 20th of last October we put on a very extensive winter construction program, totaling $11,500,000 of work, which necessarily was confined to work to be done during the late fall and winter months, consisting of grading, widening, drain structures, bridges, some gravel surfacing, and the work was all either carried on through the highway department organization, through the county, or largely by contract, which, by the way, we will receive $2,000,000 of Federal aid out of $11,500,000 to spend, and each of those jobs was designed to take care of the maximum of labor, at the same time getting efficient work, the most we could for the money, and we are taking care of some 19,000 to 25,000 men during this period.

"We have set up a minimum wage of 35 cents per hour, and we have provided for half time—that is, men working three days a week, or every other week, in order to take care of more men than on the full-time basis.

"Michigan is one of the States that has a very serious unemployment condition, and we have found in the past two and a half months that this has worked out very successfully, and the State is contributing something in this highway work to the relief of the unemployed, at the same time relieving the counties, cities, villages, and townships of a very material amount in welfare work. I am citing that as an example of one of many States, which are carrying on highway work for the benefit of labor largely at this time.

"The CHAIRMAN. What are you doing at the present time, and what regulations do you have in reference to making the road program go as far as possible in meeting the human needs of the laborer?

"Mr. DILLMAN. We are establishing, as I said, the minimum wage and 8-hour day, one-half time for these men. We are specifying certain equipment that the contractor may use on the job, and that is specified. He knows that when he bids on the work, and we are trying to utilize the maximum amount of labor on the work, without cutting materially into the efficiency of handling the work, and we do know in putting on several million dollars of this work during November and December, also early in January, that the costs have been very little more than we had during the last half of the year 1931, when there were no regulations involving labor. * * *

"Senator HAYDEN. With respect to the emergency appropriation of $80,000,000 made by Congress in December, 1930, did the State of Michigan make good use of that additional money?

"Mr. DILLMAN. Yes; our portion of that was $2,500,000 and the money was all spent. We have already received that back from the Government, and we made very good use of it and feel the money was well spent. It was spent on construction of the Federal system, and, in addition to that, we have shown our interest in it by going much farther in putting up State money on the Federal system, and we have found the 1931 work, throughout the year, that for every $1,000,000 we are spending on State highway work, which includes grading, drainage, surfacing, bridges, paving—for every $1,000,000 from 2,500 to 3,000 men are employed during the contract."

Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD the tables and data to which I heve referred.

There being no objection, the tables and data were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. ODDIE. Mr. President, the Senate has just passed the emergency relief measure. We have given out to the country the impression that we have done something which will relieve unemployment on a large scale and help to bring back normal conditions and normal times again and relieve distress. I do not want to hear any more of this pessimistic talk about the continuation of these hard times. We have had enough gloom and depression. Let us do away with these pessimistic statements and say that we have accomplished this great piece of legislation which will give hope and encouragement to the American people and that we have not worked in vain; that we have not done an idle thing or made an idle gesture.

I, for one, believe that we have done something which will mean the turning point in our present history. It will mean the end of our depression and suffering and a return to normal times.

Mr. President, let us all get back of this legislation and give hope and encouragement to the American people and to American industry and do away with these pessimistic and discouraging thoughts that have done such great harm.

I hope that those who disagree with me will study the statistics, and if so I know they will come to a different conclusion.

LEGISLATIVE APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT

The Senate proceeded to consider the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate (Nos. 46–168, both inclusive) to the bill (H. R. 11267) making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

SEVERAL SENATORS addressed the Chair.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Washington is going to explain the conference report before it is voted on.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement with reference to the conference report.

As the Senate knows, we sent the bill to conference first covering the legislative items in the bill. A report was made, and that was agreed to. Then conferees were appointed upon the second part of the bill, which contained the provisions in the interest of economy.

The conferees met. The House appointed new conferees for the purpose of considering the economy items. The first amendment is No. 46. For that amendment the Senate substituted what is known as the furlough plan. The matter went to conference in that condition.

The conferees disagreed on that item. We agreed upon all the other amendments placed in the bill by the Senate. So the conference report now involves the acceptance of the agreement that was made with reference to these various items, and the disagreement with reference to amendment No. 46.

After the conference report is acted upon, if it shall be agreed to, then will come up the question that the House proposes with reference to amendment No. 46. They agreed to that amendment with an amendment that they suggest.

As to the other items that went to conference, the conferees reached a full agreement. Some of them were agreed to with amendments.

I suppose the Senate desires to hear only about some of the principal ones of those amendments.

One amendment that has caused a good deal of trouble to the Senators, probably, is No. 67, which relates to married people in the departments.

The Senate will remember that when the matter came before the Senate an amendment was made referring only to those that come into the departments hereafter. It did not seek to interfere with married people already in the service. When it went to conference, the Senate conferees had to recede from their amendment. I want to say—I think I have a right to say—that personally I have been in favor of not having this amendment affect the married people who are now in the departments. I am not going into the reasons for it, but that was my position until the end.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what is the number of the amendment relating to married people?

Mr. JONES. That is amendment numbered 67.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Where is it found—on what page?

Mr. JONES. On page 64 of the bill.

Suffice it to say that after we had conferred in regard to that amendment, the rule was complied with that led to recession by the Senate from its amendment. As I say, I did not agree to that; but, as everybody knows, a conference report involves compromises. We had 60 or 70 amendments that we had to harmonize and settle in this matter—even more than that—and so the conference report recommended recession from that amendment on the part of the Senate. So the item as proposed relates to married people now in the service as well as those who may come in hereafter.

I desire to say that, in my judgment, that authority is not likely to be exercised very often. I hope there will be very few instances when it will have to be applied. I hope there will be very few times when any of those now in the service, whether the man or his wife, will be put out of the service. There may be, of course, some instances where that will happen; but that was one of the agreements finally made by the conferees.

I will take up the amendments in the order in which they appear in the report of the conferees.

There is the amendment with reference to compulsory retirement for age. There was considerable controversy in regard to that. There was very serious question as to whether or not we should require retirement when a man reaches the age that we have fixed for retirement. There was a controversy over the question as to whether or not there should be any extension of time. It was recognized that in some instances in connection with the Government service it is probably very important that we should retain men who are in the service, at least for a while. It probably is not necessary for me to mention any of those. We finally agreed upon their all going out when they reach the age of retirement; but we then made a provision which I think I can explain best by simply reading the agreement:

Provided, That the President may, by Executive order, exempt from the provisions of this section any person when, in his judgment, the public interest so requires.

Under that authority the President can retain those who are considered especially important and necessary for retention.

Then there was considerable controversy with reference to night employment. That is dealt with on page 3 of our report. We made a compromise with reference to that matter. The conferees agreed that there should be no pay for ordinary overtime night work; that if a man worked through the day, and then worked one hour or two hours' overtime, he should draw his regular pay. It is recognized, however, that some of these employees work regularly at night work. That is their regular employment. They are now getting, I think, about 15 per cent advantage over the pay for day work. We have compromised that as follows:

Wherever by or under authority of law compensation for night work (other than overtime) is at a higher rate than for day work, such differential shall be reduced by one-half.

In other words, where they get 15 per cent more now for overtime work, hereafter they will get only 7½ per cent for overtime.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, it was my understanding that it is 10 per cent, not 15. That certainly is true of the postal employees.

Mr. JONES. If it is 10 per cent, then they will get 5 per cent under this provision. In other words, we divided that in half.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. JONES. I do.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. Will the Senator permit me to make this observation:

I hold in my hand a letter addressed to me by the secretary-treasurer of the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, Mr. Thomas R. Flaherty. He expresses his disapproval of one item of the report and in effect regrets that the Senate conferees were obliged to recede from the action taken by the Senate as to compensation for night work.

I join in that regret. I had something to say on the subject when the bill was before the Senate. I am satisfied, however, that the Senate conferees earnestly urged the views of the Senate as expressed in the bill when it passed this body.

Mr. JONES. We did.

Mr. SHORTRIDGE. I do not doubt for one moment that the conferees appointed to speak for the Senate performed their duty earnestly, and did so in this instance, and hence the compromise was reached.

I can do no more than express my regret that they were obliged to recede from the Senate's position as to night work. It would be idle, I think, to oppose the adoption of the conference report, and any effort to amend the report as it relates to this item would be futile.

Instead of reading and taking the time of the Senate, I request to have considered as read the letter addressed to me by the gentleman named, Mr. Flaherty. If my request is granted, I shall not further detain or trespass on the attention of the Senate.

Mr. President, my immediate request is that the letter addressed to me by Mr. Flaherty be printed in the RECORD as in a sense a part of my remarks, for I agree with him. In view of the facts he calls to our attention, it is much to be regretted that the Senate conferees were obliged to recede from the position we took in respect to the pay for night work of our faithful and efficient postal employees.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

NATIONAL FEDERATION OF POST OFFICE CLERKS,
Washington, D. C., June 22, 1932.

Hon. SAMUEL M. SHORTRIDGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR SHORTRIDGE: Permit me to advise that the amendment in the economy bill relating to night work, in which you have been interested, has been amended in conference in an unsatisfactory manner. The conferees receded from the Senate amendment, which restored the pay differential, and agreed to an amendment reducing it one-half—or from 10 to 5 per cent in the Postal Service. This is covered in Senate amendment 61 in the conference report.

You will recall that the House originally eliminated the night-work pay differential entirely. The Senate restored it. The Senate amendment, therefore, was satisfactory and should now be insisted upon. This can be accomplished by striking from the conference report paragraph 2, reading: "Wherever by or under authority of law compensation for night work (other than overtime) is at a higher rate than for day work, such differential shall be reduced by one-half."

There are approximately 50,000 postal employees assigned to night duties. Thirty thousand of this number are in post offices, while the remainder are in the Railway Mail Service. Post-office night workers earn approximately $2,100 annually, including their night-work pay differential, and it is therefore discriminatory against this relatively low-wage group to require them to take a payless furlough and also a pay cut of 5 per cent.

I trust you will endeavor to have this portion of the conference report amended.

Very sincerely yours,

THOS. F. FLAHERTY,
Secretary-Treasurer.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I was called out of the Chamber for a moment, and I am not certain that this bill carries the provision with reference to married people. Is that in the conference bill?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I just explained that.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not hear the explanation. I wondered just what had been done about it.

Mr. JONES. That matter, of course, was in controversy. As the Senator knows, the Senate provided that that should apply only to appointments hereafter made, that it should not affect those already in the service. The conferees gave the matter very careful consideration—we had quite a controversy over the matter—and, according to the rules of the conference, a sufficient number voting to restore the language of the House, which the Senate had stricken out, it applies now to those who are in the service.

As I said, I hope it will not be exercised very often, and I hope the conditions will be such that it may not be necessary. But the conferees came to the conclusion that it should apply to those in the service, as well as those who may hereafter come into the service.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, was no change made in the language of the House in that section?

Mr. JONES. As to married people?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. No; that was restored to the House language.

Mr. REED. Was the attention of the conferees called to the fact that it applies only to married persons "living with husband or wife"? If they separate, it will not be applicable.

Mr. JONES. I do not think the language is quite that broad.

Mr. REED. That is the way I read it, "married persons living with husband or wife shall be dismissed," and so on. In other words, if they break up the family, this does not apply to them.

Mr. JONES. I rather think it would apply.

Mr. REED. What else can it mean, I ask the Senator?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield, I think the Senator from Pennsylvania is absolutely correct about it, because some people have called at my office saying that they are receiving very low salaries, and that it would be impossible for them to exist if one of them is dismissed, and that they will be forced to separate.

Mr. REED. In other words, in the name of economy, we are breaking up families.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Exactly.

Mr. JONES. Of course, I can see the possibility of that occurring, but I do not think it will. As I have said, however, I realize the situation. Personally, I am not for the provision; but this is a conference report. Everybody can not agree personally on every difference. There must be concessions made. So I am presenting this report because it is the report of the conferees, in accordance with the rules of conferences. They do not require that there must be a unanimous agreement.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. WALCOTT. I simply want to say, with reference to the point made by the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Wisconsin, that I have in my office the record of three couples who have testified positively that in order to retain their jobs under this new ruling of the conferees they would have to separate, wife and husband. I know of three cases of that kind specifically. That is the result of leaving that provision in.

I have given this matter considerable thought, and I can not escape the conclusion that it is actually forcing the separation of several couples who have children to support. One woman tells me that she can not go on with the education of her children if only one of the parents is working. In order to get enough income the two must work, and in order to work the wife must leave her husband in order to educate her children.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to argue that proposition with the Senator. That is the situation that confronted us, and the question is whether the Senate is going to reject the conference report because of one difference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. REED. I can think of still another action of the conferees which seems to me to be almost unexplainable, and that is the action on the amendment No. 62½, found on page 64, where apparently the Senate conferees have yielded without any effort to protect the people whom the Senate, by a practically unanimous vote, desired to take care of, and whom the House evidently overlooked. I refer to those retired officers who, in the effort to piece out their earnings so as to get as much as they were receiving before retirement, are doing double duty.

The conferees have absolutely cut them down, so that if their civilian pay amounts to as much as $3,000, they do not get a penny of retired pay.

Mr. JONES. They elect which pay they will take.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES. The House conferees were very determined about that.

Mr. REED. I can scarcely believe that the House conferees could have had their attention called to the injustice of that provision.

Mr. JONES. They certainly had. They considered it, and they were very determined in the matter. That was one of the things that was brought up along toward the close of the conference, just before it was concluded.

Mr. REED. If I vote against the conference report, it is not because of one thing, it is because of at least two things.

Mr. JONES. If we take that out of the conference report, we probably will have no agreement.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I want to add a word, not alone about the married persons' provision, but I find a great many oversights in this bill. For instance, relating to the Coast Guard and the Public Health Service, it is anything but clear.

Mr. JONES. To what page is the Senator referring?

Mr. COPELAND. To page 66. In the passage of the pay act of June 10, 1922, Congress indicated what had all along been its contention, that the pay and allowances of the six commissioned services of the Federal Government—the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, the Coast Guard, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service——

Mr. JONES. Those, I think, are all covered by amendment numbered 46, which was in disagreement and is now in disagreement but subject to a proposal by the House which will be considered after the conference report is disposed of.

Mr. COPELAND. What the Senator means is that that matter is not settled?

Mr. JONES. That matter is not settled.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me ask about some other matters. There are automatic reductions due to the falling receipts which apply to postmasters and supervisors. That is true, is it not? In the economy bill what is going to happen if these automatic reductions bring the salaries below 91⅔ per cent of the 1931 salaries? Is there to be a still further reduction in the salaries of those persons who are automatically affected by the falling receipts?

Mr. JONES. That is a part of amendment numbered 46.

Mr. COPELAND. Which is not yet settled?

Mr. JONES. That is not yet settled.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me ask another question. Do these employees get annual leave if they are exempt from the furlough and get the salary reduction? For instance, do rural carriers get their annual leave, or do they get the 8.3 per cent reduction and lose their vacations?

Mr. JONES. That is all covered in amendment numbered 46. That will come with the proposal of the House.

Mr. COPELAND. Do employees lose their annual leave earned up to July 1 if they have not taken it?

Mr. JONES. I suppose they will. We have dealt only with 1933, and after that.

Mr. COPELAND. One last word. So far as I am concerned, I spoke strongly in the committee, and do now, against this provision relating to married couples in the public service.

Mr. JONES. The Senator probably knows I was with him.

Mr. COPELAND. I know that.

Mr. JONES. Nevertheless, we have our conference report.

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BROOKHART. I would like to ask the Senator about amendment No. 69, on page 65 of the bill, referred to at the bottom of page 3 and running on to page 4 of the report.

Mr. JONES. Let me read what the conferees agreed to with reference to that.

Mr. BROOKHART. Very well.

Mr. JONES. This was the provision agreed on:

Hereafter no civilian officer or employee of the Government who receives annual leave with pay shall be granted annual leave of absence with pay in excess of 15 days in any one year, excluding Sundays and legal holidays.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is as far as the Senator need go, because the proposition I want to make is covered in that portion of it.

In the bill as it passed the House there was no reference whatever to this subject, was there?

Mr. JONES. I do not remember now. This was the final agreement made.

Mr. BROOKHART. On page 65 of the bill it is shown that it was a Senate amendment.

Mr. JONES. It was a Senate amendment.

Mr. BROOKHART. The Senate amendment applied only to employees of the Government who received both annual and sick leave with pay, whereas the "both" and the "sick" were stricken out, and as agreed to by the conference, it applies to all.

Mr. JONES. There is special provision with reference to sick leave. If the Senator will note, it is provided:

Provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as affecting the period during which pay may be allowed under existing laws for so-called sick leave of absence.

Mr. BROOKHART. But that proposition is not involved in the one I am presenting to the Senator. Here is the case. The employees at Navy yards, arsenals, Government Printing Office, and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing have no sick leave under the old law. They have just the straight 30-day leave and no more. In the amendment of the Senate on page 65 the employees of those institutions were not included and not affected in any way, because the words "both" and "sick" were used in the amendment, and in order to affect anybody in the Federal service they had to have both annual and sick leave. These classes did not have both. They had only annual leave. The conference committee has enlarged that, and instead of applying it only to those who had both annual and sick leave, in the report on page 4 the conferees make it apply to all civilian officers or employees of the Government, whether or not they had sick leave. Has not the conference exceeded its authority and added something that was in neither the Senate bill nor the House bill?

Mr. JONES. I do not think so. I think they are both covered, and I think it was the intention of the amendment of the Senate to refer in a general way both to annual leave and sick leave. I do not think it meant that it applied only to the individual who had both annual and sick leave, myself.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is what it says plainly.

Mr. JONES. I do not think it does. That is where we disagree.

Mr. BROOKHART. Why was it necessary to change it, then?

Mr. JONES. We changed it to make it plain that the regular annual leave was made 15 days and the sick leave, whatever that might be, 30 days or 15 days, would not be affected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Why should the Senate have left out these classes of employees I mention? Under the law they get no sick leave, and will get none under this conference report, whereas all other employees get their sick leave all right.

Mr. JONES. We do not intend to give any new sick leave.

Mr. BROOKHART. But these have left now only 15 days' leave and no sick leave at all.

Mr. JONES. I can not agree with the Senator. The provision applies to the 15-day men as well as everybody else.

Mr. BROOKHART. That is the trouble. The classes I have mentioned have no sick leave at all under the existing law.

Mr. JONES. We did not intend to give them any, then.

Mr. BROOKHART. But they have been cut down to 15 days on their annual leave, whereas the others have 15 days annual leave and 30 days sick leave.

Mr. JONES. The annual leave is treated by itself and sick leave by itself. If a man did not have any sick leave, we did not extend it. If he had annual leave, we cut that down.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, it seems to me we are laboring under a false impression when we conclude, as the Senator from Washington has concluded, that the Senate took no specific action upon that point. The Senate did by reason of an amendment offered by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. He offered a specific amendment to prevent that injustice, so called, to the workers in the navy yards.

Mr. JONES. What was that amendment? I do not remember it. The leave does not apply during the year 1933 to those who have the furlough.

Mr. BROOKHART. Let us get back to the text of the Senate amendment, which is all we have to start with before the conference. On page 65, section 213, it was provided:

Hereafter no civilian officer or employee of the Government who receives both annual and sick leave with pay shall be granted leave of absence with pay in excess of 15 days, excluding Sundays and legal holidays.

It seems to me that plainly applies only to those classes who receive both annual and sick leave, and does not apply to the class that receives no sick leave. They are not included at all. Then the conference struck out "both" and "sick," and thereby included everybody, and it seems to me it is clear that the conference exceeded its authority and put new matter in the bill and included a class of employees that had been left out before.

Mr. JONES. I can not agree with the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If in line 6, page 66, after the word "States," there were inserted the words "or to officers whose pay and allowances are fixed by the act of June 10, 1922 (ch. 212, 42 Stat. 685)," the matter the Senator has in mind I think would be corrected.

Mr. BROOKHART. Yes; but that is not in the bill.

Mr. COPELAND. No. That is what ought to be there.

Mr. BROOKHART. Perhaps the Senator is right. At any rate, if the text had been left as it was written by the Senate, I think there would have been no argument or trouble about it. But the conferees have struck out words that clearly put in the navy yards, arsenals, Government Printing Office, and Bureau of Engraving and Printing, that were not in there before. It seems to me that is clearly exceeding their authority. There was no provision in the House text covering those services, and they are excluded in the Senate amendment that was adopted. How could the conferees have authority to turn around and put them in when neither House included them before?

Mr. JONES. I have tried to explain my position. I can not agree with the Senator. The Senator has tried to explain his position. I do not think the matter is subject to a point of order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask that the proposed amendment and a statement regarding it be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Amend House amendment No. 69, page 66, line 6, after the words "United States," by inserting "or to officers whose pay and allowances are fixed by the act of June 10, 1922 (ch. 212, 42 Stat. 625)."

In the passage of the pay act of June 10, 1922, Congress indicated what had long been its intention, that the pay and allowances of the six commissioned services of the Federal Government, the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and the Public Health Service should be made one and the same. This action for equality between these services was primarily based on the desire of Congress to iron out any differences between these services so that a career in any one of them would offer the same emoluments.

The use of the term "civilian officers" in the first line of this amendment begins the driving of a wedge between those services in this group of commissioned officers who are civilian and those who are military, with regard to leave.

In addition, the original paragraph of this act which relates to leave, has been amended from time to time to exclude certain civilian officers and employees of the Foreign Service and the Panama Canal service.

These distinctions and differences are most unfortunate, first, because they have a tendency to upset the equality in these services with reference to a career, and secondly, because they establish no reasonable basis for such differences.

The educational requirements for entrance to any of these six commissioned services are the same, except possibly as a matter of expenses. Civilian officers bear the expense of their education themselves; military do not.

Certainly the hazard of occupation and difficulties because of absence from the United States are much the same. The hazard of the sea is the same for the Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Coast and Geodetic Survey services. Civilian and military status makes no difference. To me, as a physician, the hazard of the officers of the Public Health Service, both at home and abroad, in their studies and control of dangerous diseases such as plague, yellow fever, typhus fever, and the like, is deserving of the same recognition as officers in the Medical Corps of the Army and Navy.

It is my sincere hope that the equalities which have been established in the pay, allowances, and leave for the six commissioned services shall not be interfered with.

Mr. JONES. The provision may not bear the construction which has been placed upon it by the Senator from Iowa. There is a difference of opinion with reference to the construction of the language.

Mr. BROOKHART. At some time I shall desire to make the point of order and raise the question.

Mr. JONES. Is there any other question? There are a number of items that were agreed to by the Senate. With reference to the public-works proposition, that was a very important item. The conferees left that out. We could not include it in the special provision that we made in regard to giving the President special authority with reference to certain lines of activity. We were not able to include public works, and having to leave that out we decided to leave out the provision for forming a general organization for public works, leaving that for the President to work out and submit to Congress at a later time.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. I notice in the conference report that the Senate receded from a provision where it was provided by the Senate that the amount of the cut should be impounded and should be used for no purpose except salaries. The House provided, and the conferees seem to have agreed, that the amount of the cut shall be impounded and covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. JONES. That is in section 46.

Mr. LOGAN. Now, we come along in the appropriation bill and we make a cut in the appropriation to the amount of the cut in salaries. It seems to me that is a double cut.

Mr. JONES. The appropriation bills have nothing to do with this bill and this bill has nothing to do with the appropriation bills. There may be a cut, so far as a bureau is concerned, but it is not a cut in salary.

Mr. LOGAN. I wanted to understand that thoroughly. Suppose the 8⅓ per cent cut should amount to $300,000. In the economy bill we take that out and cover it back into the Treasury. Suppose in the appropriation bill for the same bureau we reduce the appropriation $300,000, then, do we not have $600,000 taken off?

Mr. JONES. Not from the individual salaries.

Mr. LOGAN. But if we reduce the appropriation and they have no money to pay salaries, then it is taking it twice.

Mr. JONES. Then they have to be furloughed.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BRATTON. I do not understand that there is a double cut in the manner suggested by the Senator from Kentucky. To illustrate, let us say the pay roll of the Bureau of Mines is $1,000,000, and under this bill the salaries are reduced, $200,000; that is to say, by furlough and by the 8⅓ per cent and 10 per cent cut, the combination provided, that reduction is effected. Theoretically we will appropriate $800,000 in the annual appropriation bill. By the economy bill the salary reduction is $200,000. In the appropriation bill the money actually appropriated is $200,000 less. Therefore the wage-scale reduction and the amount appropriated meet at the common point of $800,000. There is no double cut. There is a single cut of $200,000 provided in the economy bill and a reduction of that amount in the appropriation bill.

In case Congress by a miscalculation or oversight should fail to appropriate enough money to meet at that $800,000 point, there are two ways to meet the situation. One would be by the operation of the 12 per cent interchangeable provision. The other would be to furlough the employees sufficiently to overcome the shortage in appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. But in no case less than the law provides for in the reduction of $200,000.

Mr. BRATTON. That is correct.

Mr. LOGAN. I accept the assurance of the distinguished Senators.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. My understanding is if the cut has been deep enough in the appropriation bill, the Senator from Kentucky is absolutely right. There will not be any means other than to require the employee to take a double furlough, a two months' furlough instead of the one month contemplated in the economy bill. Of course, if enough has been allowed in the appropriation so the adjustment can be made under it, then there are two alternatives, as suggested by the Senator from New Mexico. But may I say to the Senator from Kentucky that there are bureaus in the Government which have been cut so severely that it is my information that employees in those bureaus will be required to take two months' furlough instead of the one contemplated by the bill.

Mr. JONES. It is not a two months' furlough in place of the one month furlough that is contemplated in this bill.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The effect on the employee is the same. The Senator can say that the two things are separated, but in so far as their impact on the human beings is concerned, they must be considered jointly.

Mr. JONES. I appreciate that. Some of the employees, with whom I sympathize just as deeply as does the Senator from Wisconsin, may be furloughed three or four months, but that depends on our appropriations. If we cut our appropriations away down, of course, some of them may have to go out two months or three months or four months or even a longer time.

Mr. BRATTON. The chairman of the committee has addressed himself to the point I had in mind. If there is any injustice such as the Senator from Wisconsin points out it is not caused by the furlough system. It is caused by the failure to appropriate enough money, and if we fail to appropriate the money the employees will not get it, furlough or no furlough.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I am intelligent enough to understand that, but the same Senators who recommended and handled the appropriation bills are now handling the economy bill, and they can not escape responsibility for the effect of the discrimination upon the various departments and bureaus of the Government.

Mr. BRATTON. That brings forward the question of economy. If the Senator from Wisconsin does not want economy he should move to appropriate more money, but not complain that this bill brings about the situation which he describes.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes; I will complain.

Mr. BRATTON. It is without substance if the Senator does.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. The Senator can put his own construction on it.

Mr. BRATTON. I shall do so.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. But when there was an opportunity to make a real cut here in one of the appropriation bills the Senator from New Mexico lost his ardor for economy, namely, when we were considering the Navy Department appropriation bill.

Mr. BRATTON. I wish that was the only mistake I have committed. The Senator from Wisconsin is more responsible for the confusion that is now found in this bill than any other Member of this body by his advocacy of the furlough plan.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Oh, no; the Senator can not escape responsibility for this conference report.

Mr. BRATTON. I am not trying to do so. I did the best I could with the material the Senator from Wiscosin and those who collaborated with him gave us.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I disagree with the Senator about that. If the friends of this bill had approached this problem from a sympathetic point of view and had been willing to resist the drive to have Congress adjourn in order that they might attend the Democratic convention, they could have ironed out many of the inequalities and injustices which they have incorporated in this report.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Wisconsin does not class me in that category. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, if I may be permitted a moment, I should like to say that, however sharply the Senator from Wisconsin and I differ—and we do differ sharply and frequently—it will always be in warm friendship on my part.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I should like to know what was the reason for providing that the money saved by these cuts should be impounded and turned back into the Treasury, when it will never be out of the Treasury if we do not appropriate it? How is it going to be impounded and turned back into the Treasury when it has never been taken out, and when there has never been any appropriation made? What is the reason for that provision, that it shall be impounded and returned to the Treasury?

Mr. JONES. The money is appropriated for salaries and all that sort of thing——

Mr. LOGAN. Not in this bill.

Mr. JONES. Not in this bill but in all the other appropriation bills.

Mr. LOGAN. The other appropriation bills cut down the expenditures to the amount by which the salaries have been reduced. So the appropriations have been reduced that much, but now we provide for this cut and say that the money shall be paid back into the Treasury.

Mr. JONES. The other appropriation bills appropriate money for the salaries of Government employees. When an employee is out 30 days without pay, that part of the money appropriated for his salary is impounded and is put back into the Treasury; and if he stays out two or three months, then that part is impounded and put back into the Treasury; but it is all appropriated.

Mr. LOGAN. Then, if I understand the Senator from Washington, who is also chairman of the Appropriations Committee, there ought not to be any reduction in the appropriations because of the cuts in the salaries for this bill takes care of that and provides that the money shall be covered back into the Treasury?

Mr. JONES. That is the very reason why we provide that it shall go back into the Treasury. There would not be any saving otherwise; and we can not tell beforehand how much will be impounded, how much will be saved by furloughs, and so forth.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. JONES. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Kentucky, by way of illustration, that if for the office of the Secretary of the Interior a hundred thousand dollars was appropriated last year, and this year in the appropriation bill which has passed the Congress there was a reduction of 10 per cent, then the amount appropriated for the personnel of that office was $90,000. That meant a saving of $10,000 upon the face of the appropriation bill.

If the Secretary had in his office last year 100 employees who drew $1,000 each a year and under the language of this bill he must furlough them for 30 days without pay, they will not draw $1,000 this year but will draw $1,000 less the 8⅓ per cent, and with the $90,000 which is carried in the regular appropriation bill, when he pays them only for 11 months he pays them only $916 apiece instead of $1,000, but will carry on the roll the 100 employees he had last year, and will have to get rid of only the difference between 8⅓ per cent and 10 per cent. In other words, he will lack some $1,600 of having just the same situation, because he will not pay the employees $1,000 a year; he will pay them $1,000 less 8⅓ per cent. So the Senator is correct, that as to that office there will be nothing to be covered back into the Treasury.

However, if in a given office for which $100,000 were appropriated last year and $100,000 are appropriated this year when the employees are furloughed for a month each, there will be a net saving in that office, and the money must be covered back into the Treasury. The bill as reported by the Economy Committee contained a provision that that money should be available for the payment of salaries, and so, instead of covering it back into the Treasury, it would have been available for the payment of salaries of other employees in the department in order to keep them from being dismissed. Therefore, wherever in the bills that have been passed the same amount has been appropriated as was appropriated last year the amount will be covered back into the Treasury, but wherever there has been a 10 per cent reduction there will be no saving at all because it is a duplication, as the Senator says.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I understand the explanation, but I can not understand how it is if we cut a $100,000 appropriation to $90,000, which is a reduction of $10,000, that is not the only reduction that is necessary in order to take care of the cuts in salaries. If, after having done that, we go ahead and furlough and provide that the amount saved by the furlough shall be taken out of the reduced appropriation, we cut it down 8⅓ per cent less than the 90 per cent.

Mr. BYRNES. I will say to the Senator that when we appropriate $90,000, in the illustration given, for the office of the Secretary of the Interior, leaving out of consideration this bill, when the Secretary of the Interior receives $90,000 to pay his hundred employees, instead of receiving $100,000, he then has to get rid of employees totaling $10,000, does he not?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. BYRNES. Now, when this measure takes effect and the 100 employees are furloughed for 30 days, they will not receive a thousand dollars a year; they will receive only nine hundred and some odd dollars a year, and there will not be the necessity of getting rid of them; but there is no saving by reason of this particular bill unless the amount carried in a specific appropriation bill for personnel is the same as that carried last year.

Mr. LOGAN. I sort of understand it, but not very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I am going to vote for the conference report on the so-called economy bill because of the reduction of expenditures as therein provided, but there are several things in the bill of which I do not approve. I do not approve of the furlough plan carried in the bill. I do not approve of those provisions governing the dismissal of married women and those over age and night employment. To my mind the furlough plan is unfair and unjust. It opens the door to all kinds of favoritism. I think the debate here to-day has shown how unjust and unfair it is, and as we go along it will be found even more unjust. It is very unjust and unfair to the rural carriers and to many other groups under the Government. Of course, I realize that a reduction of salaries is imperative, but from the beginning I took the position that all the employees of the Government should be treated alike. There was but one way to do this, and that was to reduce by an even and uniform percentage. However, even with its objectionable features, the bill should become a law. I regret that we can not correct its injustices here, but the bill is too important, it is too necessary to the Government for us to vote down the conference report, and I do not think it ought to be voted down.

Of course, Mr. President, every informed person knows that this furlough plan was and is merely a political proposal of President Hoover's; that is all there is about that. During the past few months Mr. Hoover has cried aloud for economy in government. He talked about it incessantly, but did nothing to bring it about, and when the Senate undertook, under a motion made by me, to reduce expenditures of government, he and his entire Cabinet combined to defeat every effort to make reductions in expenditures, and they succeeded for quite a while.

As Senators know, during the entire session, beginning December last, I have made very strenuous efforts to bring about a reduction in Federal expenditures all along the line. When the Agricultural bill came up—and it was the first appropriation bill to be considered—I moved to strike out 29 useless bureaus. I gave the reasons in full, but when a vote came I failed to abolish a single bureau. The Senate voted down every amendment. I finally secured some reduction, it is true, but all such reductions did not aggregate a million dollars.

Then, as Senators know, I offered the 10 per cent aggregate reduction plan. With this plan I first had better luck. In the case of the Interior Department bill and in the case of the State, Labor, Commerce, and Justice bill, my motion was adopted and passed and I secured a reduction of 10 per cent, and these reductions have been enacted into law.

Then came the Post Office and Treasury bill, aggregating nearly a billion dollars. After a hard fight my motion was adopted and the Senate referred that bill back to the committee with instructions to cut the bill 10 per cent. The whole administration then got busy to defeat that reduction. Hearings were stopped before the subcommittee and the subcommittee held no meetings for several weeks. The Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Treasury roared against any reductions at all. In order to bring about opposition to the reductions, they announced that they would have to cut off 6,000 employees in the Treasury Department and some 50,000 employees in the Post Office Department. Of course, they were without authority to discharge employees except for cause, but that made no matter to them, and thereupon they began to send out propaganda all over the country against the reduction, claiming that they would have to discharge employees. The Post Office bill carried subsidies amounting to over $60,000,000 that ought to have been cut out. Subsidies to the aircraft companies and subsidies to the shipping companies, and twenty-five million to the magazine companies, all of which could have been cut out. The Treasury bill carried $108,000,000 for public buildings, when the Treasury, under high pressure this fiscal year has expended only $82,500,000. Here $25,000,000 more could have been saved, the four items amounting to more than a 10 per cent cut in the entire bill of nearly a billion dollars, without cutting any employee, and yet the bill as reported makes only a 4 per cent cut, and that almost entirely due to a reduction in salaries.

The subsidies were left absolutely intact. Oh, yes, Mr. President, they are perfectly willing to cut the salaries of employees, but when it comes to reducing even a single subsidy of all the $60,000,000 that are paid to great interests not a dollar was reduced. The Post Office and Treasury Department appropriation bill has been reported to this body and will come up to-morrow, but it contains no reduction of the subsidies to these great corporations that need no subsidies.

Mr. President, the President and his two Cabinet officers did not want to reduce these bills. They did not want to cut off these subsidies which they had granted to the favored big interests. It was immaterial to them that the Government was $3,000,000,000 in the hole on running expenses. These few subsidized favorites must be taken care of. They never said a word about these subsidies to favored interests. They did not consider any reduction in these subsidies to favored interests, but their propaganda related only to employees. In other words, according to their own statements, they would have greatly preferred to discharge some 60,000 Government employees rather than to suspend the payment of nearly $100,000,000 to the favored aircraft monopoly, to the favored shipping interests, and to the favored magazine interests.

In the meantime, Mr. President, the whole country was demanding a reduction in Federal expenditures. On every side it was heard. People back home were clamoring for it. They were already overburdened with taxation, and they saw no reason why the vast appropriations for running the Federal Government could not be reduced.

So both sides in the Senate got together and appointed what was known as the Economy Committee, composed of Senators JONES, BINGHAM, and DICKINSON, Republicans, and Senators BRATTON, BYRNES, and MCKELLAR, Democrats, to consider what kind of salary cut and other economy reductions could be made. That committee went into every phase of the questions submitted to it. The President invited the committee to come to the White House and discuss the problem. He had Mr. Mills and Mr. Roop there; and they recommended that about $100,000,000 be taken from the sick and wounded ex-service men and that about $80,000,000 be taken, by means of the furlough plan, from the employees; and they insisted that this was the way to make the reductions.

The Economy Committee of the Senate went into the matter with the greatest energy, fairness, and care, and finally reported to the Senate a bill providing for the 10 per cent cut and an aggregate reduction in expenditures of about $148,000,000.

After that report came into the Senate President Hoover appeared before the Senate; and the following is what he said in reference to the bill as reported by the Economy Committee:

> But I do know that the committee has made honest and earnest effort to reach a just reduction in expenditures, and I trust, therefore, that despite any of our individual views or the sacrifice of any group, that we can unite in support and expeditious adoption of the committee's conclusions.

In a day or two the Senate passed the revenue bill, providing for taxes of a billion dollars additional. As soon as this bill passed the President assumed an entirely different attitude in reference to the economy bill; and I was told by Senators that he had sent for them or had talked to them and urged them to vote against the very economy measure that he had recommended in person to the Senate. By the most vigorous kind of lobbying by the President, through his friends, the plan as reported by the Economy Committee was defeated, and the so-called furlough plan was adopted by a majority of 3 votes, as I recall. The bill then went to conference, and the conference has reported the present bill.

This is the history of the economy bill.

Mr. President, it is true that the furlough plan was greatly changed in conference, and probably made better. It was made better in that as it was offered it was wholly unworkable. In many departments of Government it could not be carried out at all; and the conference committee has remedied the matter so that for the most part it does provide for an 8.3 per cent reduction.

As I understand, the President's opposition to the 10 per cent plan was that it was not a logical plan; but if, in his judgment, it was not a logical plan, he ought to recommend the repeal of the Budget law, because the plan is patterned exactly after the Budget law. The only difference between it and the Budget law was that it was 10 per cent below the Budget as passed by the House. If the 10 per cent reduction plan of the Senate was illogical, of course the same plan favored by the President and the Budget officer is illogical, But whether it is illogical or not, the furlough plan as adopted by the conference is, in all substantial respects, the 10 per cent plan reduced to 8.3 per cent. It is just marked down for the benefit of some one. The President, it seems, never objected to the 10 per cent plan on the ground that it was too much, but on the ground that it was illogical; and yet in the end the furlough plan turned out to be nothing more nor less than the 10 per cent plan reduced by 1.7 per cent. Where the original furlough plan stands it has so many inequities and inequalities in it that the employees are all complaining of it.

Mr. President, the truth is that Mr. Hoover's alleged economy was nothing more nor less than bunk. As heretofore shown, his Cabinet officers opposed every effort at economy. That is, they all did until it came to the recent Treasury bill, when Mr. Mills came up, pointing out where four million dollars plus could be taken off that bill.

Four million dollars plus! Our committee had been instructed to deduct $98,000,000 from that bill, and the Secretary of the Treasury comes and points out only $4,000,000; and when we take off the 8.3 per cent it will amount to about thirty-five or forty million dollars.

Evidently, Mr. President, the action of the Secretary of the Treasury was for the purpose of preventing greater cuts, and not because any real economy was desired. Mr. Mills himself and every other Cabinet member who appeared before our committee, claimed that if these cuts were made they would ruin the efficacy of their several departments; and, if I remember correctly, those who did not appear personally all wrote letters to the same effect.

The truth is, Mr. President, that Mr. Hoover has recommended the most extravagant appropriations for this present year that have ever been recommended in peace time by any President, and only exceeded in the two years of the World War. Since December 7 he has made the following recommendations of appropriations. I hope Senators will listen to this. The very life of our Government is at stake:

Appropriations recommended by Mr. Hoover

Dec. 7, 1931, Budget estimates, general expenses (including postal receipts and disbursements)	$4,601,479,101
Dec. 10, 1931, Veterans' Administration	203,925,000
Dec. 11, 1931, first deficiency act	126,250,333
Jan. 20, 1932, disarmament conference	320,000
Jan. 21, 1932, U. S. Employment Service	120,000
Jan. 21, 1932, Reconstruction Finance Corporation	2,000,000,000
Jan. 25, 1932, Federal land bank capital stock	125,000,000
Jan. 25, 1932, home-loan bonds	150,000,000
Dec. 7, 1931, moratorium	253,000,000

Or a gigantic total of appropriations for this year, in just nine items, of $7,460,074,434!

All of these recommendations except that as to home-loan bonds have been enacted into law. Of course, these nine are just the big appropriations. Since that time the President has sent in innumerable others that can only be ascertained with accuracy when the final figures are had after adjournment. It is fair to say that the home loan bond bill has not yet passed both Houses but it has passed the House and recommended in the Senate and no doubt will be passed and for that reason it is included in the above figures. It is but fair to say also that the $253,000,000 moratorium was appropriated before the money got to the Treasury. If the $300,000,000 relief bill that has been passed by the Senate and is now in the House and as I understand has the approval of the President, becomes the law, that will be another large sum to be added to the foregoing.

Mr. President, the Senate and House have cut down departmental appropriations at least $300,000,000. The exact figures can only be ascertained after adjournment, but with this deduction our total appropriations for this year are likely to be well over $7,500,000,000.

It will be argued that $1,500,000,000 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation should not be included in the appropriations because it was not appropriated out of the Treasury and also that the whole $2,000,000,000 is an investment of the Government. The answer to that is that the Government becomes obligated for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's borrowing and it is just the same as an appropriation. I think it also may be safely said that if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation gets back enough of its loans to pay the expenses of that organization it will probably do well.

APPROPRIATIONS OF THE LAST FISCAL YEAR

It will be recalled that the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, were $5,178,524,967.95. The result is that we have increased our appropriations under the President's recommendations, and even eliminating the reductions made by Congress, more than $2,000,000,000. It will be remembered also there was more than one-half billions of dollars of the appropriations of last year that was for various building programs recommended on account of the depression. We thus see how much more extravagant the President has been in his recommendations for appropriations than he was last year. It will be recalled also that we had a deficit during the fiscal year 1931 of nearly a billion dollars, and recent statements show that the deficit for the fiscal year 1932 will be about $3,000,000,000. Our entire revenues for the fiscal year 1932 have been less than $2,000,000,000, and it is not likely that they will increase for the next fiscal year except as increased by the billion-dollar tax bill. Assuming that that bill will add a billion dollars to our revenues, then we may reasonably expect to receive in revenues about $3,000,000,000 for the ensuing fiscal year.

BALANCING THE BUDGET

With an income for the coming fiscal year of $3,000,000,000 and an outgo of seven and one-half billions, it will be easily seen that the balancing of our Budget was but a temporary matter, and it therefore seems perfectly certain that our deficit for the next fiscal year will be tremendously larger than it was for the present fiscal year. It will also be remembered that with the approval of Mr. Hoover a naval authorization building bill under the London treaty of nearly a billion dollars more was recently passed. It is true that no appropriations have been asked as yet, because I am told the building can not begin until next January under the treaty. It is reasonable to suppose a deficiency appropriation next January will be asked in order to begin this stupendous undertaking.

I want to say in that connection that the Senator from New Hampshire a few minutes ago spoke about this other great bill which unfortunately, it seems to me, passed this afternoon. It is going to unbalance the Budget. I want to say that it does not take that $3,000,000,000 to unbalance the Budget. The truth is that the figures of the appropriations for this year show that the Budget is already unbalanced, and the deficit in the Treasury for next year will be far greater than the $3,000,000,000 deficit we have for this year. We can not balance the Budget and continue to appropriate the enormous sums out of the Treasury that we have been appropriating.

THE PRESIDENT'S CLAIMS FOR ECONOMY

It will thus be seen, Mr. President, that the President's claims of economy in administration are wholly without foundation. No President in peace times has ever recommended such extravagant appropriations. We have had before us from the President almost every conceivable nostrum for getting out of the depression. If any of these nostrums have been of any real avail, I am not aware of it. The President's claims for economy are without the slightest foundation in fact, and, of course, those who seek to hold the Congress responsible for these enormous expenditures are simply not acquainted with the true facts. The only just criticism of the Congress is that it has too often acceded to the wastefully extravagant demands for appropriations by Mr. Hoover.

Mr. President, during this entire session of Congress I have from time to time called the attention of the Congress and of the country to these extravagant and wasteful recommendations. I have so often brought them before the Senate that I know Senators are tired of hearing of them. The foregoing figures are entirely accurate and are taken from the RECORD, and I challenge anyone to dispute them. They should be carefully considered by the Congress and the country. Our Treasury is indeed in a sad condition, and we can not better that condition by continuing to borrow money to pay these extravagant appropriations. We have got to call a halt to them. If this Government is to stand, we have got to live within our income, or it will be just a question of time when our bonds can not be sold on the market and disaster will overtake us. The administration of Mr. Hoover will go down in history as the most extravagant, the most wasteful in the history of our country, and unless these appropriations are reduced and the country lives within its income it can not be but the forerunner of unmentionable trouble.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee has been one of the leaders in behalf of economy and has made a good fight. I simply wish to ask him in case we reject this report does it mean rejecting all hope of economy or reductions in Government expenses?

Mr McKELLAR. I am afraid so, and for that reason I am not willing to jeopardize it. As I have stated, there are a number of things in this report to which I object, which do not meet my approval at all. I think they are wrong. I think the provision in reference to married people, for instance, where husband and wife are both working for the Government, is outrageous; but I am not willing to jeopardize the $160,000,000 of reductions in expenditures for that, because I know that hereafter we can remedy those provisions.

Mr. ASHURST. That is the very point upon which I desired information from the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I want to say that I shall take a great deal of pleasure in doing everything I can, at the first opportunity, to remedy these situations.

Mr. ASHURST. May I presume to ask the Senator, then, if he feels that notwithstanding the obvious injustices herein, he must choose the lesser of two evils and will vote for the report?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall probably follow the Senator.

Mr. McKELLAR. I made that statement at the outset.

Mr. ASHURST. Referring to the question as to reductions in compensation of policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia, I desire to say that in all America there are no more overworked and underpaid servants than the policemen and firemen in the District of Columbia. My advice and my understanding is that this conference report can not and will not be construed to cause them to receive both a reduction and a loss of their annual leave. If I thought that the conference report deprived these faithful firemen and policemen of their earned annual leave and at the same time reduced their salaries, I should vote against the report.

I have, however, consulted authorities upon whom I am accustomed to rely; and they advise me that by no torture of words can this bill, when it becomes a law, be so construed as to deprive the Metropolitan policemen and the members of the fire department of the District of Columbia of their annual leave and also require them to suffer this loss in salary. The Senator from Tennessee has given this matter close consideration. Does he agree with my conclusion in that regard?

Mr. McKELLAR. I agree with the Senator in the view he has expressed.

Mr. ASHURST. I thank the Senator.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, the Senator spoke of his enthusiasm for economy, and I approve of that.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I did not say that. I spoke of the duty that I felt was incumbent upon me, when I found that my Government's Treasury was bankrupt, to support all measures of economy.

Mr. COPELAND. I accept that statement. What I am saying is not at all critical. What I wish to ask the Senator is this:

Since we have this bill, and it is sure to carry these items of economy, if there are imperfections in the details of the way it is written, would it not be better to refer it back and have those corrections made? It would not involve the matter of money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, at this late day in the session I am in great doubt whether we would get any bill passed at all if we sent this bill back; and for that reason I think we ought to adopt this report.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator once more for information.

I am not satisfied with the report, although I appreciate the immense and diligent labor that was given to it. When, however, Senators such as the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], and the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] assure me that the Metropolitan police and the firemen of the District of Columbia do not lose their annual leave—and in all the Government service no class of persons have more truly earned this stipend than they—when these Senators give me this assurance, notwithstanding the other objectionable features, I feel it my duty to vote for the report.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad the Senator will do so.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for just a moment? I can satisfy the Senator from Arizona in regard to that matter.

The furlough provision, which will come up after the conference report is disposed of, says:

All rights now conferred or authorized to be conferred by law upon any officer or employee to receive annual leave of absence with pay are hereby suspended during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

But in the next paragraph it says:

(a) The terms "officer" and "employee" mean any person rendering services in or under any branch or service of the United States Government or the government of the District of Columbia, but does not include * * * (5) policemen and firemen of the District of Columbia.

That expressly takes care of that matter.

Mr. ASHURST. I am content.

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I do not desire at this time to raise the point of order with respect to amendment numbered 69, relating to annual leave with pay reduced to 15 days; but I do want the RECORD in the morning to contain briefly the history of that particular amendment.

The Senate committee had provided section 213, as follows:

Hereafter no civilian officer or employee of the Government shall be granted leave of absence with pay in excess of 15 days, excluding Sundays and legal holidays.

On June 7, according to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, I offered an amendment to that particular committee amendment, which I ask to have printed in connection with my remarks, including a brief explanation of the amendment offered at that time, and the assurance of the chairman of the committee given at that time.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, June 7, 1932, page 12150]

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment which I offer to the committee amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In the committee amendment, on page 59, line 7, after the word "Government," it is proposed to insert "who receives both annual and sick leave with pay."

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I am sure there is no intention on the part of the committee nor can there be an intention on the part of the Senate to do anything other than to play fairly with all the Government employees, no matter what their station may be. It happens that in the Government Printing Office, in the navy yards, and in the arsenals, as I understand, are employees who receive no sick leave whatsoever. They, with their 30-day annual leave, are going to be, I think, much more severely dealt with by the committee amendment, without the acceptance of the amendment which I have offered, than are any other Government employees. The amendment I have proposed would eliminate the application of the committee amendment to those governmental employees who do not have the benefit of sick leave. I hope the amendment may be accepted.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, after listening to his explanation, from hearing the amendment read, I think we may very well let the amendment go to conference. There is certainly no intention to discriminate against any of the Government employees.

Mr. NYE. I am sure there is not.

J. D. STEWART

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3119) for the relief of J. D. Stewart, which was to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

That the United States Employees' Compensation Commission is hereby authorized to consider and determine the claim of J. D. Stewart, who purports to have suffered injury while employed as a rural carrier about April 17, 1926, in the same manner and to the same extent as if said J. D. Stewart had made application for the benefits of said act within the 1-year period required by sections 17 and 20 thereof: Provided, That no benefit shall accrue prior to the enactment of this act.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

CAPPER-KELLY FAIR PRICE BILL

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two letters recently received by myself urging early action on S. 97, a bill introduced by myself in the Senate and intended to eliminate, as far as possible through Federal legislation, the evils of predatory price cutting.

I just want to say, Mr. President, that failure to enact legislation along the line provided in S. 97 and sponsored by Representative KELLY in the House, is placing on Congress the responsibility for the elimination of many independent merchants from business.

This S. 97 might well be termed an honest merchandising bill, in the long-time interest of customers as well as merchants. I hope to get early action on it by the Senate. I send the letters to the desk for printing in the RECORD, together with a letter to Representative KELLY.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RETAIL DRUGGISTS ASSOCIATION (LTD.),
Los Angeles, Calif., June 14, 1932.

Senator ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR CAPPER: We have heard very little recently regarding the status of the Capper-Kelly bill. Some of us are getting rather impatient and feel that we are entitled to some consideration on this wonderful bill of yours.

Each year it seems that Congress has some excuse—because of other legislation this very important bill has to be sidetracked. It is about time that we make a political issue of this, and unless some consideration is given to it we plan to form a nation-wide alliance to make an issue out of it.

The mortality in the ranks of independent merchants is increasing to an alarming extent. Decent men and women can not compete with the present predatory price-cutting racketeers. Merchandising, especially the drug business, is becoming a racket that will destroy the honest merchants, and the public also will suffer greatly because pharmacy is deteriorating, which will be a sad thing for those who need medical care in the future.

Cut-rate signs are making our Broadways look like a bowery of tin horns and rubber balloons instead of the dignified, clean-looking streets we used to have, and this condition continues to add to the great army of unemployed. We continue to make appropriations for relief purposes. This, of course, we must do to feed the hungry as long as we have food and clothing; we should not permit our people to go in want, but how much better it would be to remove the cause of our trouble rather than to continue to treat effects. The longer we continue the present system the deeper we will plunge our country into the mire with the danger that we will not be able to recover from it.

Your bill is a clean-cut honest measure, and if the American people are denied such a fair piece of legislation it may mean some day that we will be confronted with radical legislation. What is the principal reason that Congress refuses to consider such a bill?

We should like to have your suggestions, and we assure you that we are prepared to go the limit to help bring about action on S. 97. We are ready to write every association in the Nation to urge a united action if you think the time is right to do so and that there is a chance for action in the Senate.

Yours very truly,
SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA RETAIL DRUGGISTS' ASSOCIATION (LTD.),
FRANK E. MORTENSON, Secretary.

ASSOCIATED CIGAR MANUFACTURERS AND LEAF TOBACCO DEALERS,
New York, N. Y., June 8, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR CAPPER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: On behalf of the Associated Cigar Manufacturers and Leaf Tobacco Dealers, of which I have the honor to be president, I desire to urge you to use your best endeavors to secure consideration before this session of Congress adjourns of the so-called Capper-Kelly honest merchandising bill (S. 97).

This bill applies only to merchandise identified by trade-mark or in some other manner, and does not apply to ordinary staple products, which are not identified.

Contrary to the impression in certain quarters, it should be understood that the bill does not make compulsory the maintenance of prices fixed by the manufacturer unless pursuant to a contract between the producer and his distributors; in other words, manufacturers, even though their products be trade-marked or identified, would not be obliged to take advantage of the proposed law, and all contracts entered into between themselves and their distributors would be entirely voluntary.

There can be no doubt that one of the great evils of the present time is the predatory price cutting which is pursued by a certain class of merchants who are practically the only opponents of the Capper-Kelly bill. It contracts to maintain resale prices should be legalized, manufacturers desiring to protect their distributors would be able to insure to the latter reasonable profits, while fair competition in the sale of their products would keep prices down to a reasonable level and furnish to manufacturers an incentive to build up quality.

The price cutter of to-day makes up any losses he may incur through cut prices on widely known identified products by excessive profits on goods with which the public is less familiar. The rapid concentration of retail merchandising in the hands of a few great combinations is to be credited in considerable measure to their cut-price tactics as applied to goods of known quality and value. Using these as "bargain bait" they have been able to persuade unthinking buyers that all other goods are sold at similar reductions.

Thousands of small merchants throughout the country have been driven out of business by the price cutters, thus contributing in no small degree to the present financial depression. It is certainly demoralizing to any trade when merchants are no longer able to operate their independent stores but must join the already overcrowded ranks of clerks and salesmen and drift into the ever-increasing army of unemployed.

If through the exercise of your influence you can assist in bringing about the passage of the honest merchandising bill you will earn the thanks of independent business men and those depending upon them in every part of this broad country and assist materially in the restoration of prosperity. I am

Very respectfully,

JOHN H. DUYS,
President Associated Cigar Manufacturers and Leaf Tobacco Dealers.

Hon. CLYDE KELLY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. KELLY: The American Manufacturers of Toilet Articles, an organization of which I have the honor to be president, is deeply interested in the early enactment of S. 97, the so-called honest merchandising bill, now on the Senate calendar and which has been reported from the Senate Interstate Commerce Committee. We earnestly hope that in spite of the fact that Congress is soon to adjourn, an opportunity will be afforded for action on this bill before the summer recess.

The members of our association recall with great pleasure the splendid talk on the subject of this bill which you made at one of our recent conventions. It has been an inspiration to all of us to work in every way possible for the passage of the bill, which we believe will work a great reform in merchandising methods in all trades. We have not been discouraged because it has seemed difficult to get this proposed law on the statute books, and we fully approve the tactics adopted in bringing the measure forward in the Senate in this Congress in advance of its consideration by the House. If the Senate should pass the bill, action by the House should follow promptly, as the bill went through that body in the last Congress, and passage of the measure by the Senate would certainly have a favorable influence at this time.

Our industry has been facing some very serious problems with regard to the sale and distribution of our products. Predatory price cutting has had an extremely injurious effect upon our business and coupled with other questionable practices has done much to demoralize our trade. The courts have made it clear that legislation is necessary to meet this situation, and that until some such measure as the Capper-Kelly bill is enacted we will be powerless to put an end to unfair competition or to protect ourselves against attacks by the Federal Trade Commission if we resort to agreements with our distributors to maintain prices. Nearly all civilized countries permit such agreements, and as you are aware they were considered to be legal in this country until a few years ago when the Supreme Court made it clear that the enactment of such legislation as is contemplated by your bill would be necessary to legalize price-maintenance contracts between producers and their distributors for the maintenance of resale prices of trade-marked or otherwise identified merchandise.

We trust you will exercise any influence at your command to assist in obtaining the early consideration of the Senate draft of this bill and that it will be practicable to obtain the passage of the measure by both Houses in the present Congress.

Assuring you of our hearty support and our deep appreciation for anything you may be able to do to help us at this time, I am, with kind regards,

Cordially yours,

H. HENRY BERTRAM,
President American Manufacturers of Toilet Articles.

MISS JULIA C. LATHROP, FIRST CHIEF OF THE UNITED STATES CHILDREN'S BUREAU

Mr. COSTIGAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a recent wise and stimulating address by Miss Lillian D. Wald, well-known sociologist and publicist, on the life work of Miss Julia C. Lathrop, first Chief of the United States Children's Bureau.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JULIA LATHROP

The life and work of Julia Clifford Lathrop are woven into the very fabric of all that has color and vitality in social work as we know it to-day. The story of her life is recorded wherever record is kept of the distinguished pioneers in such work in America. It was a period that developed a type of scientific philanthropy in what was then a new field, and it marks an important chapter in the rise of American civilization.

Miss Lathrop was born in Rockford, Ill., in 1858, and received her preliminary education at the college in her home town and at Vassar, of which college she later became trustee. But her search for truth, which is knowledge, never ceased, as those will attest who have come within her sphere of influence. Miss Lathrop was one of the early associates of Jane Addams, and combined with that brilliant group when she was still a young woman. Although they learned much by discussion and by their life and work in the neighborhood of Hull House, discussion alone never satisfied, even though we acknowledge it to be a means to broaden knowledge and to quicken skill. Miss Lathrop realized that investigation and adequate study must precede any program of action to bring about a better balance and to stabilize the social machinery of the State. She knew that without accurate presentation of a cause the social energies latent and unexpressed in a community might just go muddling along, and that to bring the kindly instinct and aspirations of people into focus requires intelligent knowledge of facts.

Programs for amelioration of antisocial conditions must be based upon facts ascertainable and subject to intelligent interpretation. But help to children could not disregard environment and the other causes productive of misery and the deformity of life. Her trails led to the establishment of the Chicago School of Civics and Philanthropy; she was its first vice president and very often the acting president. The effectiveness of the school owes much to the participation of Julia Lathrop in its formative days and throughout her life.

Julia Lathrop supplemented through her own efforts the available material about which studies and reports and programs were to develop. She was responsible for the special studies of the care of the insane, and the juvenile court laws. Of these Doctor Meyer and Judge Mack will speak. Several times, officially and unofficially, at her own expense, she visited foreign countries for observation and study of their methods. She was a member of the Illinois Board of Charities, and when membership seemed to give acquiescence to conditions of which she heartily disapproved a resignation was accompanied by frank and forceful comments and had much to do with the effective reform in that community. Resigned in 1901, she boldly declared that the State institutions were subject to political exploitation. She is credited with having stirred Illinois women's clubs to aid in securing a State civil service law for State institutions, whereupon she accepted reappointment in 1905 and served for years.

Miss Lathrop was an active crusader for woman suffrage, and later became an assessor of the child welfare committee of the League of Nations. Many were the honors conferred upon her. Her degrees from colleges included the unusual distinction of a degree from Yale University, worth noting, since the male colleges do not often give evidence of their approval of the good works of women, but in bestowing it they handsomely declared that it was "a recognition of a fearless humanitarian whose career is a public blessing." President Masaryk, of Czechoslovakia, knew her in the old Hull House days, and his Government decorated her in recognition of the remarkable assistance she rendered to that country in organizing its child-welfare activities. President Masaryk had invited her to come to his country and participate in organizing the children's bureau there, and with the consent of our Government she accepted this invitation but defrayed all her own expenses. Poland, too, offered an honorary award in appreciation of her service to that country. Mexico and other countries enlisted her interest in creating plans and programs for dealing comprehensively with the welfare of children.

It is fitting that her very distinguished contributions, particularly in her earlier life, should be noted by those who had the privilege of knowing her personally and intimately in Chicago. But at a memorial meeting in Washington it is appropriate to dwell upon what was the culmination of her long years of preparation, the effective use of her talents in the establishment of a Federal Children's Bureau. In the judgment of President Taft and his advisors, hers was the outstanding personality, and the country owes her a great debt, a priceless debt, for developing a public agency which immediately established lofty standards in its appointments, and from which we have a story of almost unexampled ideals in the working out of a governmental bureau devoted to children.

I question whether any Government bureau anywhere started with such good fortune. She brought a dowry to it which included her years of knowledge and experience, her economy, her devotion, her intellect, and the radiance of her humor; and she brought, too, with it a statesmanlike quality which protected her from rushing into causes, however good or plausible, without knowing who and what was back of them. She knew how to enlist people and, if the cause was right, did not hesitate to exercise her statesmanship to win their help.

With these talents and the small appropriation placed in her hands, she performed miracles of economy, getting across, as one says, that this bureau was functioning for the deepest interest, the most valuable possession of our life and Nation, and in the magnitude of her task she did not lose the realization of the individual. Orders throughout the bureau were definite that a letter from the illiterate mother, written for her by the small hand of an 8-year-old child, was to have as quick and as careful attention as if the letter had come from a governor.

One hundred and twenty million people have recently lost a child, and that poignant sorrow for one child is a measure of the supreme concern for the child. That is true the world over, and it was a basic idea in the founding of the bureau.

When the Federal Government established that bureau lovers of children affirmed their concern for all the children of the Nation and the obligation of the Government to them. The studies that were made under this first chief's direction made her personality felt immediately, for who but one that thought deeply of children, who had had practical experience with measures for their welfare, could so readily have grasped the range of the factors that entered into the protection of children? She who with profound thought and feeling and not sentimentality understood well that really to protect children from exploitation and to give them the opportunity to develop to the highest level possible was appropriately the concern of the Government, stressed the point that prevention rather than remedy was the keynote.

Some of us have very strong feelings about the nuisances of questionnaires that pour upon crowded desks. A questionnaire always seems the first easy tool that is employed by students or promoters. Though Miss Lathrop used scientific methods and could tabulate her findings in ways immune from statistical criticism, her humor enabled her to see their limitations. I recall a conference in New York on day nurseries. Critics of the day nursery had implied that husbands would more readily desert their wives if there were some place for the children. Miss Lathrop reported that after careful study of the statistics she had found the greatest number of children brought to the day nurseries were fatherless from unavoidable causes, and she thereupon offered the deduction that day nurseries stimulate widowhood.

I think it was to her credit that the two urgent matters that brought her to New York, before she took up her work as Chief of the Children's Bureau, were to talk over the studies that were to be made for the bureau, and to find a good dressmaker, that she might appear becomingly for the bureau.

I wish that one of her intimate colleagues, one of the "great ladies" of Chicago and Hull House, might be here, though Grace Abbott, as one in that honored group, will take up the thread and supply omissions as fully as a presiding officer may. But it would be quite wonderful to have a complete picture of those early days, when the group plotted and consummated the measures that scholars and social workers particularly value as fundamental. Besides Jane Addams herself there were Nisba Breckinridge, Alice Hamilton, Ellen Starr, Mary McDowell, the lamented Florence Kelley, and Grace Abbott, who, of all people in our American life, was ordained to follow Julia Lathrop as Chief of the Children's Bureau.

Julia Lathrop, in any group, with her own staff or in a meeting on any social topic, made a definite contribution. She had a broad vision and understanding, and was, moreover, an original thinker, not satisfied with beaten paths, but never making the mistake of going off at a tangent. She maintained an unusual balance, as her writing, her works show. She was not afraid to initiate work in which she believed, because not to do anything about a conviction was a cardinal social sin. Thoroughness was essential.

When the bureau was first begun the staff numbered only 15. Working in foreign areas, investigating, and reporting it was impossible to obtain accurate data without interpreters. No money for interpreters was included in the Budget, so Miss Lathrop herself paid for their services out of her own money, and, of course, she was never repaid. One of her staff said the other day that Miss Lathrop was an inspiration to those who worked under her. She was interested in their individual development, and helped many of them in the solution of their personal problems.

There will be record to-day of Miss Lathrop's place in the advance in human care that has been achieved for the insane, her participation in the creation of the Mental Hygiene Society, and her share in the development of juvenile court work. But I recall her return to New York from New Haven, where Clifford Beers had introduced himself and had so moved the little group by what was no less than a sensational presentation of his experience. Julia Lathrop came to Henry Street that night excited, exalted, and with renewed vigor for the cause.

I should like to say that, despite her own sturdy power to understand people and affairs, she did not adhere unduly to her own opinions, nor did she think that she was foreordained to be the spokesman. Her modesty was marked, and her wisdom in enlisting the active participation of other people was manifest.

But once the need for action on her part was clear, her courage carried her through. Precipitation at an inopportune time was never her mistake. The steps that marked her way included analysis of a problem and its formulation and presentation; the enlistment of skill and sympathetic support; the formulation of a program which was always to be flexible enough to emerge from too tentative a state to a stable plan of operation, and without undue delay. In short, she had decision, she knew her way, but she had an open mind and she knew how to listen.

I suppose that she could do so much and be so much because she was a woman of three dimensions—breadth, depth, and height. This trinity enabled her intelligence to comprehend the significance of conditions and to enter the lists for the depressed and the offender, to see things that could not have been obvious to anyone who had not the tradition, as well as the inclination, to look up as well as around. What she and her group have done has become the warp and the woof of American social endeavors, but it was Julia Lathrop who, more than anyone else, pulled out from their obscurity the poor beings in almshouses and insane asylums. She was not afraid to tear the curtain from their hidden world, because unless people knew and felt a part of their degradation nothing would be done.

Within a brief time Florence Kelley has gone, and Julia Lathrop. Night before last I had the privilege of addressing a meeting in Washington in Mrs. Kelley's memory. This afternoon I feel that much that we have said and thought about Florence Kelley and Julia Lathrop is identical, though their fields of enterprise were not identical. Both of them gave a lesson that should never be forgotten; namely, that dissatisfaction with social conditions is only an emotional indulgence unless the protest and indignation are translated into constructive measures. Both fulfilled the deepest impulses of their natures. Both had gifts of tongue and gifts of pen, and both had the supreme gift of the capacity to work hard. It is inevitable that at this time they should be united in our minds.

It would mean little, however, to Julia Lathrop or to Florence Kelley to receive credit for what they have done. I think both were peculiarly indifferent to praise that was not accompanied by ready participation. I think that Miss Lathrop would consider any tribute to her as inconsequential if her life of action, her share in helping people to realize responsibility for a more satisfying social relationship were buried with her. The sincerity of those who profited by her life has been tested and will be tested by holding fellowship with the things that were precious to her, by remembering that no one of us can live with self-respect unless we march with the world for a better and fairer distribution of culture, safety, and protection against economic and related disasters of our people.

The times are ripe for tangible assertions of our faith, and Miss Lathrop belongs to a wide circle. Miss Addams, her friend, characterized her as "the most useful woman in the whole country," and the New York Times adds that the civilized world might have been included in that appraisal. And further, her influence in other lands has given her a place among the foremost women of her day on the earth.

The foundation of the Children's Bureau was her greatest interest and the one that focused attention on her rich life. The best that she did lives after in the continuing quality, the unceasing lofty execution of that trust. I think that we may feel that we are inheritors and that we are definitely responsible for treasuring the bequest.

TARIFF ON COPPER

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, on April 19, 1932, the Representative in Congress from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS] made a statement of the necessity for a tariff on copper before the Senate Committee on Finance. I ask to have the statement printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE NECESSITY FOR A TARIFF ON COPPER

Representative DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am appearing to-day in behalf of the copper-producing States of the United States; but before I proceed to the main burden of my argument, to demonstrate the effect of foreign competition upon the copper-producing States, I would like to take three or four minutes to refute some of the statements which have heretofore been made.

Mr. Chairman, there has been much loose talk about the table this morning with respect to copper. It has been stated that only 30 per cent of those operating in the United States favor a tariff on copper. Permit me for a minute to analyze that statement. It is true that the Anaconda Copper Co. is not among the group of companies advocating a tariff, but it is equally true, Mr. Chairman, that approximately 60 per cent of the production of the Anaconda Copper Co. originates in South America. It is true, Mr. Chairman, that the Kennecott Copper Co. is not here advocating a tariff on copper, but it is equally true, Mr. Chairman, that a very large part of the production of the Kennecott Copper Co. originates in South America. As a matter of fact, practically every exclusively American producer—by that I mean practically every copper company which produces copper solely within the United States—is here asking you to grant them relief.

It has been stated, Mr. Chairman, that the United States is a net exporter of copper. Permit me just for a moment to recite the following figures: In 1929 the United States was a net importer in the amount of 55,000 tons. In 1930 the United States was a net importer in the amount of 86,000 tons. In 1931 the United States was a net importer in the amount of 61,000 tons. At the present date the United States is a net importer in the amount of over 300,000 tons.

Senator SHORTRIDGE. Does that take into account fabricated products?

Representative DOUGLAS. It does not take into consideration the fabricated products for 1929, 1930, and 1931; but if they were included, we would still be net importers of copper.

It has been stated, Mr. Chairman, that there is practically no difference between the cost of production in the United States and the cost of production abroad. I do not propose to go into that question in detail, but I do propose to state, as a matter of fact, that the foreign reserves contain twice as much copper per ton as do the reserves within the United States. In other words, the foreign reserves are twice as valuable per ton as are the reserves within the United States; and even though the cost per ton of mining, smelting, and concentrating were the same in the United States as abroad, the cost per pound of copper would be substantially greater in the United States for that very reason.

It has been stated here, Mr. Chairman, that the tariff on lead and zinc has resulted in no benefit to the lead and zinc industries. As a matter of fact, Mr. Chairman—with your permission I will insert the exact figures in the RECORD—since the tariff was put upon lead and zinc the differential in favor of the domestic market in both instances has ranged between 40 and 50 per cent.

Mr. Chairman, I was born in Arizona. I was raised in Arizona. The whole history of that State is bound up with copper. It is because of that industry that the great transcontinental trunk lines—the railroad lines—were constructed, and the ramifications, the spurs from those lines were built. It is because of that industry, sir, that agricultural communities have prospered, that Federal reclamation projects have been constructed, and it is because of that industry, Mr. Chairman, that large modern communities have been built up permanently, not temporarily. They are not shack towns, such as one sees occasionally. They are real, modern communities, enjoying all of the facilities of modern life.

I ask you, gentlemen, all to observe this picture [exhibiting a photograph], which is characteristic of the mining community.

These communities, sir, have been built up solely around the mining companies. They have no other reason for existence than the mines. If the mines disappeared, these communities would disappear; they would become desolated.

The CHAIRMAN. The Congressman's five minutes have expired. How much more time would you like?

Representative DOUGLAS. May I have a few minutes?

Senator CONNALLY. Mr. Chairman, I move that, in view of Senator ASHURST'S request, Congressman DOUGLAS be given 15 minutes in all.

The CHAIRMAN. You may continue.

Representative DOUGLAS. In fact, Mr. Chairman, practically every activity in my State is dependent directly or indirectly upon the copper-mining industry. The evidence that has been adduced here this morning shows that because of the great pressure of foreign production the copper-mining industry of the United States, at least almost all of it, is faced with extinction. At least one great State of the Union and all of its people are faced with complete and absolute impoverishment. Permit me to give you a picture of the fiscal condition of the State of Arizona, and here may I interpolate that, though I speak of the State of Arizona solely this morning, what I say is equally true, or true in varying degree, of 13 other States.

I speak of Arizona because I know more of the conditions within that State than elsewhere. The copper mines, the railroads dependent solely upon them, and the communities that have been built up about them in the State of Arizona pay 56 per cent of the total taxes of the State, which represent $12,000,000 toward a total State budget of $21,000,000. If the State of Arizona be deprived of that $12,000,000, there will remain, Mr. Chairman, but $2,000,000 after servicing the public debt of its political subdivisions. Is this not conclusive evidence that at least one State is faced with permanent bankruptcy?

In 1929, Mr. Chairman, the railroads received in revenue on account of freight shipped to the mining communities over $9,000,000. In 1931, during the first six months thereof, that revenue was but $1,500,000. And it is estimated in 1932 that it will fall below $1,000,000. In 1921 the products of the mines resulted in over 6,000,000 tons carried by the railroads, representing 86 per cent of the total tonnage originating in the State of Arizona. That has fallen off to 4,000,000 tons, and it is estimated in 1932 it will fall to 750,000, or almost 90 per cent. Is that no conclusive evidence, at least with respect to that one industry, that hundreds or thousands of men are dependent upon it for their employment, for their livelihood?

In 1929, Mr. Chairman, one reclamation project alone received over $1,500,000 on account of the sale of power to the copper mines. In 1931 their revenue had fallen to $600,000; and if the mines permanently shut down, that revenue will be nothing. Is not that evidence that the farmers who pay water charges are intimately connected with the copper-mining companies? Is not that evidence that to a very large extent their existence depends upon the copper-mining company?

In 1929, Mr. Chairman, the copper-mining communities purchased $16,000,000 worth of products produced in Arizona, lumber and various products produced in the agricultural communities. In 1930 that had fallen to $7,000,000, and in 1931 to $3,000,000, and it is estimated that in 1932 it will not exceed $1,500,000.

The mining communities themselves, Mr. Chairman, have a population of over 130,000. Twenty-one thousand one hundred and forty-two men were employed in the mining industry in the State of Arizona in the year 1929. By May 1 of this year, Mr. Chairman, there will not be in excess of 2,500 men employed, and by July 1, Mr. Chairman, there will not be in excess of 1,600 men employed in the copper-mining communities of the State of Arizona. And by the 1st of July it is estimated that there will be 28,000 destitute people within the State of Arizona. That, sir, gives you some picture of the extent to which my State depends almost exclusively upon the copper-mining industry. It is a real emergency, Mr. Chairman, and I ask you, sir, to deal with the emergency and to grant us our request.

I have listened to the testimony of the American Metals Co. this morning, and I take this occasion, sir, to emphasize upon you that the American Metals Co. is a foreign producer. It owns not one single copper mine within the United States. It is the sales agent for the International Nickel Co., in Canada. It has one refinery in Carteret, a large part of whose capacity in the past has been devoted to foreign copper. It controls one of the greatest producing mines in Rhodesia. It has substantial interests in every great company within Rhodesia. It, sir, is here pleading the cause of the foreign producer, and I am here pleading the cause of the American producer. I am here pleading the cause of the American industry, of American communities that depend entirely upon this great industry. I am here, sir, pleading the cause of the American miner.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, Mr. Ladner's predecessor died in office, and the office has been vacant for a considerable time. The pressure of work is very great; and there has not been any objection, so far as I know, presented to the committee or to the Senate with regard to the confirmation of Mr. Ladner. I ask unanimous consent that the President may be notified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the President will be notified.

Moos, which the Senator from Oregon has requested to have passed over, and the nominations of postmasters in Tennessee, which the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] has asked to have go over, I ask unanimous consent that the rest of the nominations of postmasters be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations of postmasters on the calendar, with the exceptions indicated, are confirmed en bloc. This completes the calendar.

CHARLES J. MOOS

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a resolution in behalf of Charles J. Moos, from St. Paul.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ST. PAUL, MINN., June 23, 1932.

Hon. THOMAS D. SCHALL,
Senate Office Building:

Tri-State Postmasters, composed of postmasters from 200 Minnesota post offices and some from North and South Dakota in convention at St. Paul, have found interest in and desire for reappointment Charles Moos as postmaster at St. Paul overwhelming. Because of his long and intimate association with pharmacists of State while secretary of State pharmacy board, his close and intimate contacts with postmasters through both business and social interests and during past year as their president, his close contacts with editors of press in various postmasters' localities, have made reappointment matter of state-wide as well as local concern. The magnificent courtesies accorded this convention by business interests of St. Paul has brought forcibly to our attention the very great esteem in which Charles Moos is held and the insistent demand by said business interests for his retention. The Tri-State Postmasters therefore have unanimously adopted following resolution directing me as secretary to transmit it with earnest request that you use your best efforts that this confirmation be brought about before adjournment: Be it

"Resolved by the Tri-State Postmasters Association of Minnesota, North Dakota, and South Dakota in convention assembled at St. Paul, Minn., June 21 and 22, That we express our continuous loyalty to President Herbert Hoover and commend his wise and patriotic administration standing firmly for the right during these trying days. We also commend splendid work of our Minnesota United States Senator THOMAS SCHALL in his protecting the interests of agriculture and the laboring men in the Northwest and express our gratitude for his tireless work on behalf of employees of the Post Office Service; be it further

"Resolved, That we do heartily recommend the confirmation at the present session of Congress of appointment of Postmaster Charles Moos, of St. Paul, on account of splendid administration he has given in city of St. Paul as testified to by Postmaster General Brown and First Assistant Postmaster General Arch Coleman."

E. J. MERRY, Secretary.
